It was translated into the language of idolatry to adapt it to the condition of an idolatrous people. The church and the translators knew it would be the more readily accepted, and the task of converting or proselyting to the new faith would be rendered far more easy. At this time the political factions had become united and the government more stable under one or two monarchs or kings who ruled over lords and serfs.

The people knew nothing about Bible thoughts and Bible language, till they were translated into their own vernacular. They never knew or heard of any lords and saviors but those with whom they were living, their masters and owners. They had an idol they called gott, and ghosts, ghouls, specters, and spirits, and the different forms and names for the invisible agencies and powers, such as frequent and haunt the habitations and hunting-grounds of all barbarous and uncultivated races. But when the Bible brought to them an account of those that had existed in Judea and in Greece and Rome, the priests made them believe that they were holy spirits and ghosts and lords, because holy men said so and had written them down in a holy book. So they accepted them as such in the place of their own lords, spirits, and ghosts.

The class called lords were those who by inheritance or by their superior shrewdness and sagacity had possession of the lands and of the serfs or servants that resided on them. These lords were the masters, guides, rulers, and saviors of their serfs. The serfs were expected to serve their lord and master.

Some of these lords were kind and tender with their serfs or servants, and the servants were affectionate. These could say "our dear lord and master," "our blessed lord and savior," and all the different forms of phraseology were applied to these lords or rulers that we now find applied to Jesus in the New Testament. Then the word christ or christos, which had long been used and simply meant goodness, was made by these translators to represent a personage, and that christos or goodness was to become their savior; that is, they were to be saved by being good. Goodness, or gott-ness, called the christos in Greek, was to be their "lord and master." He, or it, was to be their "blessed lord," their "holy and divine lord," and they should obey its impulse and promptings, its inspirations and revelations, as they should arise in the mind and feelings of the humble servant of this new inward spiritual lord.

But as to the serf or servant masses, whose mental condition and conceptions were too low to comprehend principles and virtues acting directly upon the mind and conduct, they could not think of them in the abstract; they had to associate with their idols or some external forms, substances, personages, or names.

How easy and natural it would be for them to reverence and worship that name and title given to him who taught and illustrated such lessons as are recorded in the New Testament, especially when their priests and teachers led off in their pathetic and glowing descriptions, and their vivid pictures of his virtues, his sufferings, and his tragic end. In contemplation of these ideas and images with the names of Jesus Christ, the lord who once lived in Judea and was so good and kind to his serfs or servants, they exalted him into a character superior to any of the English lords they knew. He was such a "good lord" in their estimation they could scarcely find words to describe their estimate of him. They called him "the lord of glory," "the divine lord and master," "the lord gott," "the lord of heaven and earth," and all the endearing testimonials, compliments, and honors, we find bestowed on him in the New Testament. They had images and pictures of him, or what they supposed might represent him, both in his infancy and maturer years, which when they beheld and associated with his name, they bowed before in reverent homage, with more devotion and obsequiousness than they had ever felt for their own live lords under whom they were daily living in the capacity of serfs. How easy it was at that time, when the spirit of idolatry was so universal and none had the capacity to see and feel beyond it, for Christian idolatry to become established and to be believed as an exceptional virtue. It began then, and as the priests thought, from a matter of necessity, arising from the low and unfortunate condition of the people. Having started as part of English Christianity, we as their English-speaking descendants continue to cherish it as such. Our religious teachers, with few exceptions, persist in enforcing it upon us because they hav been taught so to do, and are pledged to continue it by the conditions and requirements of their creeds. The few who hav no creeds—the Friends and some other small sects—find it more easy and congenial to fall in with the popular idolatry than to take any trouble to inquire into its origin, or to make any efforts to abandon it, and thus purify themselvs of its debasing and enslaving influence.

The British, being an aggressiv and courageous people, when once enlisted in behalf of this faith hav not failed to do their share in pressing its claims and propagating it. In their colonies they hav had their missionaries to enforce its superiority over all other religions. Rome introduced it to Europe, and England has been a faithful ally in diffusing it. The literature, the style, the sentiment, and idolatry of a religion that was translated for and adapted to a degraded population of serfs, remains among us in this free, intelligent, and enlightened age as a standard for our culture, our philosophy, and faith. We are required by it and its advocates to accept the idolatrous ideas, the personifications, images, allegories, legends, and pictures connected with it as literal statements of facts and a record of historical truth. In doing this we are nothing else than practical Christian idolators. There seems to hav been a combination, a unity between all the Christian sects in maintaining the obligations of all professing Christians to accept the most idolatrous parts of this faith. They all unite in stigmatizing any doubt or denial of it as Infidelity, as heresy; and coöperate or sympathize with any movement for crushing it out. With the church, to be a Christian, it is necessary to be an idolator. Not to be an idolator is to be an Infidel. Christianity, as taught and entertained by almost every church organization, as a system of faith, never was and is not now anything more than a modified and modernized form of ancient heathenism embellished and ornamented with literary culture, supported by wealth and luxury, an imposing and gorgeous church architecture, and an educated and disciplined priesthood who persist in maintaining it as of divine origin and as the only scheme for man's salvation. Science is disclosing the truth and daily demonstrating the utter absurdity of this scheme and its idolatrous pretensions. The only hope for the world being released from this idolatry is through science. When the mind and judgment are supported and made strong by scientific truth, credulity and superstition will lose their hold, and the faith and affections will be guided by the intelligence, and not by the traditions and delusions, the habits and thoughts, of a past darker age. The infatuation of a religion can never be broken by persecution nor ridicule. What is seated and centered in the affections, however false, can be dislodged only by enlarging and strengthening the mind, in developing the reasoning and analytical powers, in training them to bring every question to the test of a rational, rigid, and discriminating criticism. Our salvation and release from the thraldom of this spiritual bondage can only be effected by the improvement and perfection of our public schools and educational institutions. The object and purpose of education must be to train the young to think. Thought must come to the front in religion as it does in science. Thought and freedom will break every chain, banish superstition, and abolish idolatry in any special or holy guise it may present itself. Thought is constantly gaining and triumphing over feeling and faith. When the mind is strong and free the emotions cannot rule. Let us strengthen our own and one another's mental grip, that we may be redeemed and help release others from every form and vestige of Christian idolatry.

The Church Triumphant.

Such is the name of a peculiar church that arose in our midst and is flourishing to-day. I will tell the story of its rise and growth as truthfully as I can in the following narrativ:

In the years 1874–1877 there lived in this village (Byron, Ill.) a Congregational minister and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Beekman by name. Mr. Beekman was then pastor of the Congregational church and was a much respected man. He occupied the pulpit here for three years to the entire satisfaction of his congregation. His wife's name was Dora, a beautiful, intelligent woman and one whom you must like on first acquaintance. She was a model of piety and their home was truly a happy one. She was a fluent speaker and could talk for hours, and being possessed of considerable personal magnetism, could hold an audience almost spellbound. She was a woman pure and without guile and has never been charged with impurity by anyone, not even the unbelieving, nor her husband from whom she was soon to separate. None question her private character. But from this pleasant home in our quiet village strange happenings were to come. That quiet chamber of hers was to be regarded by many as sacred as the manger of Bethlehem is regarded by others. While sleeping with her husband one night in 1877 she awoke at midnight seized with an uncontrolable desire to pray, and went into another room and knelt in prayer. As she was praying a strange, unearthly light filled the room and a voice was heard calling, "Dora! Dora!"

"Abba, Father!" the lady replied, and the answer came:

"Thou art much beloved of the Lord!"

Mr. Beekman, who in the mean time had awakened, saw the light shining and heard the voice and made inquiries as to the matter. She made a reply that quieted him and resumed her place by his side. In the morning she went forth as the bride of Christ, the lamb. As she was good, pure, beautiful, she made converts. She visited many places. Among the rest she visited Alpena, Mich., the home of George J. Schweinfurth, the Christ of to-day, and the leader of the Church Triumphant. Schweinfurth was at that time pastor of a Methodist Episcopal church of that place. He fell in with her views, and they were much together. He followed her to St. Charles, Minn., where they were frequently out riding. The purity and goodness of her life was such that no suspicion was excited by this, and the unbelieving as well as her disciples hold her spotless. There is a story that her husband once knocked the Rev. Schweinfurth down, but all was pacified by Dora making arrangements so that he would see the soon-to-be Christ no more. She was very activ, visited many places, founded seven churches, as follows: Byron, Ill.; Paw Paw, Ill.; Chicago, Ill.; St. Charles, Minn.; Kansas City, Mo.; Buena Vista, Col., and Alpena, Mich. Her followers were chosen from the well-to-do in life, and were men and women of more than ordinary intelligence, as the word is. She made a few hundred converts, presumably two hundred. Her activ days were soon at an end. While visiting at Buena Vista, Col., she sickened and died. This was in April, 1883. Her body was sent to Byron, via Kansas City and Chicago. Her followers looked for her to rise on the third day, and did nothing toward embalming the body. Decomposition set in, and on the fourth day, and before she was sent East, attempts were made to embalm the body, but were not successful. Her remains arrived in Byron, and were placed in Mr. Beekman's front yard over the night. He wished the coffin opened. This the disciples refused to do, but the trustees, headed by the president of the village board, under threats of legal proceedings, compelled the opening. The remains were those of Dora Beekman. She was laid at rest in Byron cemetery. Not rising on the third or the seventh day, her return was looked for on the fortieth day. She did not materialize. The bright stars look down on her grave in silent mockery. Her disciples next claimed that her spirit had descended on Schweinfurth, and he went forth to preach the everlasting doctrin of perfection.

The sect was for a short time known as Perfectionists, one peculiarity of their belief being that the spirit of God dwells in every perfect Christian as it dwelt in Christ, and that everyone may become a perfect Christian if he will believe the Bible and fulfill its requirements. This doctrin I hav directly from the lips of Schweinfurth in his conversation with me. That is their leading doctrin as distinct from the orthodox church. Schweinfurth succeeded Dora admirably. He visited his churches, levied his tithes, and prospered. He knew a good thing when he saw it. In appearance he is slender, not tall, with reddish whiskers and hair, with an intellectual head and intelligent face, but with a decided trace of sensuality in both looks and development of head. Many deeded their property to him. On the farm of one of these he built his palace, called "Heaven," a magnificent place, elegantly furnished, a Mecca for his followers. It is situated eight miles north of Byron. The grounds are well kept, the land well tilled, the residents hav flourished in wealth. His has been an activ life. He has labored hard. Persecution of the pen began to reach him. He was once assaulted with decayed eggs in St. Charles, Minn., and just now public opinion is at fever heat regarding him, but no action will probably be taken, as the people who do most of the talking will do nothing else.

To cap the climax of absurdity, he now teaches the doctrin of immaculate conception. Mary Weldon, a virgin, one of his disciples, brought forth a child on Thursday, August 14th. It is said to resemble Schweinfurth to an astonishing degree. Her testimony given on the Sunday preceding was that she was pure and guileless, that the presence of the Holy Ghost o'ershadowed her, and that which was conceived was pure and holy. The writer cannot say whether Schweinfurth regards himself as the whole trinity or not. Her five brothers share in her belief, and express the opinion that if anything was wrong some one would suffer. As I understand the doctrin, it is taught that that which is conceived of the perfect Christian is pure and holy as the conception of Christ was pure and holy. There are several other cherubs around the palace with bright hair and angelic features, the result no doubt of immaculate conception. It is rumored that he deserted a wife and several children in destitute circumstances in Alpena, Mich. I do not know. The orthodox regard the doctrins given above as the unpardonable sin, blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, for which there is no forgivness. It is a terrible travesty indeed on the Christian faith. Said a Christian woman to me: "It is having its terrible influence on the young, and is taking away the last vestige from them of respect for the Bible."

Schweinfurth is a voluble talker and in his presence our local ministers are silent, as he has a remarkable knowledge of the Bible. His cash receipts, by express and money orders from the various disciples in different parts of the United States, are said to exceed the receipts of any business man in Rockford, a city of twenty-five thousand population. He said to the writer: "My whole life has been spent in leading men to God. I preach the Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible." He is not crazy, far from it. Some regard him as a sharp, shrewd ministerial confidence man. His disciples regard him as the Christ and his visitation as that of his second coming on earth. He has broken up many families, wives leaving their husbands to join some of the numerous colonies. The disciples wear a persecuted look, never become angry, are always on the alert to be persecuted and abused for the cause, and always obey their leader without question. It can be said of them that they are exemplary citizens and discharge their obligations punctually to the ones with whom they hav dealings. Some regard Schweinfurth as the Man of Sin spoken of in the Bible. Others say it is a fulfillment of prophecy, where it is said that false Christs shall arise. I will make no comments. My duty is simply to relate, unbiased, the history, so far as I can, of this strange sect, and as many of my readers will hear of this for the first time, be amazed, and regard this production as a fabrication, I will say that I hav not willfully misstated one single fact. EDWIN S. ELLIOTT.

Study Moral Ethics!*

In the "Advance Project of a Code of Morals," Jean Paul Cee has already formulated these thoughts which he develops in the present work:

"The social sovereignty resides in the universal body of citizens."

"The moral authority resides in the universality of consciences;" that is to say, in the universality of free consciences; in such as hav thrown off the yoke of blind faith and are not inclined passivly to be bound by a few demonstrated truths. Man is not a moral being, an activ agent of evolution, unless he uses his intellectual faculties. The abdication of reason is moral suicide, annihilation of conscience.

A century has passed since the Revolution proclaimed the end of divine law and the birth of the legal sovereignty of the people. It is the duty of our time to proclaim, to define, to found the sovereignty of the people in moral law—in the law and the manners, the whole social covenant. The hour has come.

Science has demonstrated the dying-out of dogmas, the sterility of mystic symbolism, the absurdity and danger of the biblical conceptions of the cosmos, as well as the arbitrary and irrevocable character of teachings in which the human mind is chained by the impostors of supernatural revelation. Through anthropology, through the application of the science of comparativ mythology, it has been proved that the gods and religious customs of every nation hav one common source: the human mind. Science has traversed every Olympus, every heaven, and yet she has found but one god: man reflected with all his passions in the heaven of his imagination, and filling the universe with his shadows and peopling it with ghosts.

The religions hav demonstrated their inability to conquer evil; yes, what is more, they hav sustained and developed evil. They claimed to bring peace on earth through the acquiescence of blind faith, through the servitude of conscience, through the despotic government of priest. See the use to which they hav put their divine mission. They hav saturated the earth with human blood, spilt in wars where brother stood against brother. They hav sown the seed of enmity between nations and with satisfaction presided at their extermination. They hav organized barbarism, consecrated social iniquities, made blind fanaticism a law; and mankind would hav perished utterly in these bloody riotings were it not that the instinct of self-preservation and reason had made themselvs manifested through the mouth of thinkers and martyrs to Freethought.

What would hav become of poor humanity had it not rebelled against the degrading doctrin of original sin, the subjection of woman, the despisal of maternity, the glorification of celibacy; against ignorance and submission, prayers and resignation? What would hav been the result had mankind consented to clothe its reason in the shroud of voluntary servitude and enter the grave alive, that it might secure bliss and happiness in another world?

The cycle of supernaturalism is closed. Soon will the pope's tiara greet the royal crown in museums of religious antiquities. The clergy has been despoiled of its divine halo; the church bewails the loss of intelligent and honest believers: her only children are those whom habit or profit has induced to remain.

Mankind has returned to earth from its researches in the infinit; and the seed planted in its bosom by the sages of times past ferments amidst the ruins of a partly destroyed world. Mankind is forever cured of its belief in the fata morganas of a providence, it rests now assured in the truth of a gradual, everlasting development according to natural law; it relies now on itself only; it takes its own destiny in its own hand, that it may in the valley of tears, the creation of false teaching, found a brotherhood of men built upon the principles of justice and love.

Upon our time's church morality—a morality superficial and weak like the hypothesis on which it is founded—will follow a clearer and more general conception of man's duty to his fellow-men, and we shall approach the goal of harmony where conscious altruism will replace the animal selfishness, where man will do the good simply on the impulse of his heart.

This is no dream born of altruistic feeling. The study of nature clearly reveals the band that unites all living beings. She makes selfishness a disease, a prison; altruism, an irresistible craving.

To work upon the development of life, upon the perfection of humanity, upon the realization of universal peace; to destroy the boundaries of the "I," to let the true and good shine in all their splendor; to feel in your veins the pulsation caused by the beating of the heart of universal life—is this not the greatest joy, the only joy?

But to do the good it is not sufficient to will it, one must know it. Hence the necessity of knowing the conditions which produce and favor development, of defining what constitutes rights and duties, that the rebuilding of society may be brought about in the spirit contained in the sublime trilogy of the Revolution: Liberty, Truth, and Justice.

"In these troublesome, but activ times," said Benoit Malon, "it is not sufficient that one aspires to the good, one must work for its establishment."

A Truly Christian Utterance.

This pronouncement by the Rev. W. F. Ferguson, of Petersburg, Ill., printed in the Cumberland Presbyterian, of Nashville, Tenn., is, if true, of great interest to the subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"Unbelief is the damning sin of the world. Other sins are great, such as murder, theft, etc., but none are so great as unbelief. Unbelief is the rejection of Christ and the redemption that is in him. Persons often claim that they are not great sinners, because they do not murder or steal or commit any of those outlandish acts which society everywhere condemns. And that their habits are as correct as the habits of many that are in the church. But the question does not turn on the correctness of one's habits, but on the relationship he sustains to Christ. One's outward life may be as good as any, and still he be not a Christian, because he has not believed on Christ. To be a Christian and in a saved condition, one must accept Christ as a personal savior. If he has not done that, no matter what his outward life may be, he is guilty of the damning sin of the world. Sin, which is the transgression of the law, brings man into a state of condemnation, or under the sentence of the law; but unbelief, or the rejection of Christ, produces damnation."

Rev. Mr. Ferguson goes on to say further that sin is not necessarily eternally fatal, for it can be washed out in the blood of Jesus, but unbelievers must suffer the wrath of God because the blood of Jesus cannot be applied to them. "He that believeth not the son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." This cheering passage is from John iii, 36. Mr. Ferguson takes the liberty to add "forever" to the duration of the wrath, and this would be a good word for the anti-second-probationists to find there, but it is not so stated in holy writ; therefore we may hope. Considering the chances of the plain sinners, Mr. Ferguson finds that they are all right if they do not reject Christ; and then concludes from the proclamations of scripture that "all sin centers in the rejection of Christ. It is the greatest of all sins, that which damns the soul. . . . Unbelief, or the rejection of Christ, is fatal."

These statements are, of course, the logical sequence of the Presbyterian creed, and Presbyterianism is the most logical of all the Christian sectarianisms. Admit its premises and its conclusions must follow. Mr. Ferguson has but stated plain and straightforward Christianity; but how revolting it is to common sense, to kindness, to all decency!

It is in the gospel of John that we find this barbarous doctrin, stated again and again, amplified and made plain. "And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but hav eternal life. For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but hav everlasting life. For God sent not his son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved. He that believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten son of God." "He that believeth on the son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the son, shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life. Verily, verily, I say unto you, the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the son of God; and they that hear shall liv." "And shall come forth; they that hav done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that hav done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation." "And this is the will of him that sent me, that everyone which seeth the son, and believeth on him, may hav everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day."

All who believe that teaching must agree with Mr. Ferguson that unbelief leads to hotter consequences than murder, or theft, or rape, or religious persecution. They must believe that the believing murderer goes to heaven, while the unbelieving murdered goes to hell; that the destinations of the believing robber and the unbelieving robbed are the same; that the believing wretch who outrages a girl sits with Jesus and the unbelieving victim, dying from the consequences of the crime, goes to her father the devil; that Bruno, perishing in the flame, is now in eternal torments and the priests who piled fagots around him are at this moment in eternal bliss! It is the plain teaching of scripture, and except ye believe ye cannot be saved.

But, practically, who does believe these things? Where will Mr. Ferguson find a supporter among the educated Christians? Even the majority of the Presbyterians are ashamed of their creed, and want to revise these things out of it. Twenty or thirty years ago, about all the evangelical Christians agreed with him; it was common for ministers to say they regarded an Infidel as the worst man in the community, though his life were blameless, and there were jailbirds around in scores. But times hav changed. We hav serious doubts if five per cent of the orthodox Christians will now agree with those old fellows who told dreadful tales about the Infidels and regarded Thomas Paine as the devil.

What, then, does this signify? Only this, that Christianity is dying. The old, militant, aggressiv, stern, uncompromising, logical religion is going, and is being replaced by a humanitarianism which is modifying even to destruction the old anthropomorphic God. As a daily journal puts it, the general drift of Protestantism is toward the Unitarian universalism and the distinguishing demand of that system of teaching that religion shall not be dogmatic, but shall be kept within the limitations of human reason and human conceptions of justice. Pulpit exceptions, fossils like Mr. Ferguson, only emphasize this change. Three decades ago, his words would hav excited no comment, so generally were the same sentiments held. The world now reads them and laughs, forgetting that he is really the Christian, who will laugh last, while the scorners are the ones who will, if the gospels be true, find the retribution he hints at. They are the ones whom Holyoake characterizes as without candor as to facts which they lack the sense to see, or the honesty to own, or the justice to denounce, and consequently present a sentimental view of Christianity which has no basis whatever. But, through them, Christianity is being wounded unto death, and our sympathies are with the unwitting assassins of a religion which has done so much harm in the world, and which, if it could be revived, would repeat its performances.

Auricular Confession.

A friend residing down South drops us a postal card saying:

"Article 'Confessional,' in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 26th, pages 472–3, column second, paragraph second, assigns this to 'Jewish and pagan beginnings.' Historical confirmations of such an assertion are desirable."

That is an easy task our correspondent sets us. As D. M. Bennett once expressivly put it, "to convince the candid examiner that the Christian religion is made up from religious systems which existed many centuries prior to it; that in every essential particular it is a mere plagiarism, a reconstruction of the dogmas and superstitions of older heathen nations, it is only necessary to study the pages of history bearing upon the subject." This is absolutely true. Scarcely any phase of the Christian religion—no essential dogma or rite—when followed back will be found to be an exception. All hav been copied. Christianity is by no means original; it is an adaptation of other forms of religion to the supposed needs of the people of more modern times. To prevent violence to the feelings, to induce the adoption of Christianity, ceremonies and rites were changed but little, and often not at all—the name of the religion only was changed. What was pagan before Constantine became converted was Christian afterward. "The statues of Jupiter were used to represent Jehovah. Isis and her babe were changed to Mary and the infant Christ. The trinity of Egypt became the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Christianity compromised with paganism." The constructors of the Christian system went early and often to the religious wells of the ancients and drew freely from their depths. Mr. Bennett traces forty events, traditions, ceremonies, and dogmas, now regarded as Christian, to preëxisting religions. These of course are the essentials of the system. Hundreds of non-essentials—metaphysical speculations and alleged philosophical conclusions—are shown by numerous authors to be identical.

The confessional is to-day regarded as part and parcel of Catholic Christianity, as one of the sacraments, and uninformed devotees, Protestant as well as Catholic, think it has always been such. This is by no means the truth. For the first three centuries of Christianity [before Constantine], says the writer on this subject in the Encylopedia Britannica, an authority of some consequence, little or no mention is made of any such practice. Private, or auricular, confession was a development, and grew up gradually. Christian fathers like St. Cyprian, St. Basil, St. Gregory of Nyssa, and others, recommended the practice, but St. Augustine paid little attention to it, and St. Chrysostom declared that confession to God was sufficient. The practice, however, extended, until at the fourth Lateran council, held under Pope Innocent III., in 1215, it was enjoined upon all members of the church of Rome once a year.

Where did the practice originate? We answer, Among the pagans and Jews. It was one of the draughts made by the Christian fathers from the ancient religious wells. The doctrins of the confession and remission of sins, we are told by Judge Waite, author of the "History of Christianity," on the authority of Volney, "prevailed anciently in India; also among the ancient Persians and Parsees." Voltaire tells us that confession was practiced in all the mysteries of Egypt, Greece, and Samothrace. When Marcus Aurelius participated in the Eleusinian mysteries, he confessed himself to the hierophant. In the ancient religion of Thibet and Nepaul, among the other resemblances to Catholicism, is found the practice of confession.

The Christians, however, says Voltaire, took their confession from the Jewish rites, and not from the mysteries of Isis and Ceres. But the Jews, he also admits, borrowed a great many of their rites from their neighbors, and it is by no means improbable, therefore, that they borrowed this practice. At any rate, among the Jews it was the custom, on the annual feast of expiation, for the high priest to make confession of sins to God in the name of the whole people. The people were also enjoined to confess individually to God. In some cases, as in that of Achan (Josh. vii, 19), acknowledgment before man was demanded. In others, acknowledgment to the priest (Lev. iv, 5) is commanded (see Ency. Brit., vol. vi, p. 228). In Buck's Theological Dictionary the Jewish method of confession is thus given: On the day of the feast, the high priest confessed the sins of the people to God; besides this general confession, the Jews were enjoined, if their sins were a breach of the first table of the law, to make individual confessions to God; but violations of the second table were to be acknowledged to their brethren. The early Christians adopted this practice of open penance, and it was enjoined by St. Paul (1 Cor. v, 2). It afterward appeared, says Voltaire, more convenient that this should be the privilege of the priests. The Mishna, which comprehends all the laws, institutions, and rules of life which besides the ancient Hebrew scriptures the Jews thought themselvs bound to observe, says that often in confessing the Jews placed their hand upon a calf belonging to the priest. Every culprit under sentence of death, says the same work, went and confessed himself before witnesses in some private place.

Voltaire tells the method of confession of the Jews on the day of the feast of expiation, called the solemn atonement. "The confessor repeated three times thirteen words of the seventy-seventh psalm, at the same time giving the confessed thirty-nine stripes, which the latter returned, and they went away quits."

It is admitted by the Protestants that the apostles could remit sins, but they claim that Christ's commission to do this went no further, or at the most "to those whom a discernment of spirits was communicated." The Catholics, however, claim that the power has been continuously given to the priests through the apostles and their priestly successors. Be this as it may (and the whole ceremony is an absurd farce), confession was not generally practiced for centuries after Christ. In Constantine's reign, says Voltaire, confession was limited to publicly confessing public offenses. In the time of the apostles confession was not a sacrament for the sufficient reason that the word sacrament was then unknown. In the fifth century penitentiaries were instituted for the absolution of those who become idolators. This confession was abolished under the emperor Theodosius. A woman having accused herself aloud to the penitentiary of Constantinople of lying with a deacon, the indiscretion, as Voltaire calls it, caused so much scandal and disturbance that the faithful were permitted to approach the holy table without confession and to take commnnion in obedience to their consciences alone. It was to avoid such public scandals that St. Chrysostom declared against confession, saying: "Confess yourselvs continually to God; I do not bring you forward on a stage to discover your faults to your fellow-servants; acknowledge your sins to God, who will not reproach you before men." Thus it is seen that the thousands of Spanish ladies who accused their confessors of having seduced them had an example in very early times. Voltaire concludes that the practice of confession was not general till the seventh century, and was first made obligatory upon the monks by their abbots, who required them to confess their offenses to their superiors twice each year. The practice grew till in 1215 it was made a "sacrament." The consequence of this we showed in a general way in the editorial referred to by our Southern friend. The particular instances of its damnably infamous working would fill volumes.

Confession has also been, and is, practiced by the Calvinist Protestant sects, though they deny its sacramental character; in this going further than Luther, the precipitator of the Reformation. Lutherans still practice it; so do the Episcopalians, and in early times the Scottish Calvinistic ministers used it to disciplin their people. The Methodists of our day are forced to confess, and no less an authority than the Rev. James M. Buckley, D.D., editor of the New York Christian Advocate, thus describes it in his paper of August 21st, in the present year of his Lord. The method he prescribes is in answer to a question as to what a man shall do who has "backslidden," but wishes to get up the hill again. Dr. Buckley replies: "It is necessary for you to confess your sins in general, and in particular to God. It is necessary to make a humble acknowledgment in the ordinary social meetings of the church that you hav erred and strayed away from the right path, but it is not necessary for you to giv particulars of past sins unknown to the people. It is frequently a temptation of the devil to make a man believe that he ought to confess the particulars, and then when he shrinks from that to cause him to feel that there is no hope. On the other hand, to confess the sins previously unknown to the people might make it impossible for them to believe in you, to giv you any opportunity to reform. Having sinned, you should be very humble, and not attempt to put yourself forward until a considerable time has elapsed, during which you lead a truly consistent Christian life. Confession of particular sins is necessary to those who are aware of the sins, and to those who hav suffered by them, and also in public when the people are aware of them. Under other circumstances a general confession of sin is sufficient, and the particular confession should be made to almighty God."

From the numerous lapses of the Methodists, we are afraid Dr. Buckley is another St. Chrysostom, and fears scandal to the church in publicly confessing particular sins. He knows as well as did St. Chrysostom that "God will not reproach you before men," but it would undoubtedly be as awkward for most Methodists, and especially the preachers, to publicly confess particular sins as it was for the woman who accused herself to the penitentiary of Constantinople.

Cheek.

Surely the Christians of the country cannot realize how cheeky their propositions in regard to "Sabbath" observance are; but if they do, then they are the most arrogant people in the world!

They talk about the "Lord's day" and the "Christian Sabbath" as an acknowledged period of time, when the fact is, and every theologian knows it well, that if there ever was a "Lord's day" and a "Sabbath," Sunday is not that day at all.

But if Sunday were the Sabbath, the cheek of the church is none the less. The church-members of the country number less than one-third of the population, and they are the only people who desire "Sabbath" observance. The other two-thirds are perfectly willing to use Sunday in a rational manner; yea, they are anxious to do so if the tyrannical church people will only allow them to. But this one-third cheekily and arrogantly assume to dictate to the remainder of the population what they shall do on Sunday. One church-member, they assume, shall rule two non-church-members! Hear the Methodist organ:

"Unless the friends of the Sabbath make such a vigorous protest that those in charge of the Columbian Fair, to be held in Chicago in 1893, cannot afford to ignore it, that institution will probably be kept open on Sundays. Many influential secular papers and foreign societies are demanding it. The sub-committee on the permanent organization of the fair has already expressed the opinion that this demand should be granted. The decision of this committee is not final, but it shows that the views of some who hav control in the case are unfavorable to the observance of the Sabbath in connection with the great exhibition. If their sentiments should prevail, and the sacredness of the Lord's day be disregarded on that occasion, it will be a great national calamity.

"To open the fair on the Sabbath would be to offer an open indignity to all the Christian people of America. They all consider the Sabbath a holy day set apart for religious purposes. They consider themselvs bound to keep it holy. They do not think themselvs insulted when those who differ from them in this refuse to keep it holy also; but if in a national movement, in which they hav an equal interest with others, and are invited and expected to participate, that day is systematically desecrated, they cannot do otherwise than consider themselvs deeply wronged. To close the fair on Sunday can wrong no one nor afflict the conscience of any; but to open it on that day will do violence to the Christian sentiment of the whole nation, and deeply wrong every Christian who may desire to participate in it."

It seems to us that if the "Lord's day" is of such supreme importance, it is at least of considerable import to keep the right day. But this is not done. Saturday is the Sabbath, if there be any Sabbath; Sunday is only a day selected by the Catholic church; selected, too, for political reasons, because that was the pagan "Day of the Sun" which the people would more readily observe.

If the fair be open on Saturdays, as it will of course, the Jews may regard it as an indignity to their holy day; but then, the Christians do not seem to care any more for Jewish feelings than they do for Jewish persons or property—and this is only to torture the persons and confiscate the property. But why should the feelings of the Christians be taken into account and the feelings of the other two-thirds of the population ignored? Hav they "not eyes, hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer as a Christian is? if you prick us, do we not bleed? if you tickle us, do we not laugh? if you poison us, do we not die? and if you wrong us, shall we not revenge?"

Let the Christians think of these things, and be less arrogant. To open the fair on Sunday can wrong no one; for no one is obliged to remain away from church to attend. It cannot afflict the conscience of any, for Sunday is no "Sabbath" at all; but to close it on that day and open it on Saturday is to afflict the consciences of all Jews and "Seventh Day" folks who keep the only scriptural Sabbath.

But the Methodist organ is not the only exhibitor of cheek. The "Sabbath" Association of Illinois, of which Hon. G. P. Lord, of Elgin, is secretary, in a circular letter to churches, labor unions, and other associations of citizens, asks for the adoption of resolutions relating to the fair, as follows:

"That we thus early urge the managers of the World's Fair to follow the precedent of the centennial celebration at Philadelphia, in 1876, and of the American exhibit at the world's fair in Paris, in 1889, and so arrange its program as not unnecessarily to secularize the Christian Sabbath. That we earnestly request pastors, church clerks, and secretaries of various ecclesiastical, ethical, or beneficial societies, to use their official influence in securing action of the organizations they represent in favor of the great Sabbath reform movement, and forward the same to the secretaries of the Sabbath associations of their respectiv states, or directly to their respectiv members of Congress, asking their personal and official influence in securing the passage of the Sunday rest bill, now before Congress. Finally, that we respectfully urge the Evangelical Alliance, now organizing in the cities and large towns, or a Sabbath committee of smaller towns, to giv special prominence to the Sabbath reform, and use its prestige and influence in securing the coöperation of denominations in hastening the indorsement of the petition for the Sunday rest bill, now before Congress, and in securing action of churches and ecclesiastical bodies in measures for assuring a proper program for the World's Fair in 1892–3."

The "Sabbath" Association of Illinois is not lacking in assurance, that is certain. Why don't they apply to Congress for permission to run the country all the time, instead of only one-seventh? Then they could imprison and burn the Infidels, build finer churches, and quarter the elect upon the country for good. There would be no more trouble about a surplus in the United States treasury, and the tariff discussion could be stopped at once.

Did He or Did He Not?

In a letter to W. C. Reid's Spiritual Instructor, printed last November, Mr. Lyman C. Howe stated that Mr. Reid was a slate-writing medium, and that all Mr. Reid's public demonstrations were under absolutely fraud-proof conditions, and that to private sitters he said: "Bring your own slates, privately marked and fastened as you like, screwed, nailed, riveted, or tied as strongly as you please, and keep them in your hands, and under these conditions the slates are filled with messages."

In the Progressiv Thinker of August 16th, writing from Cassadaga, Mr. Lyman C. Howe says: "I hav had sittings with . . . Walter E. Reid . . . for independent slate-writing. In every case it was a total failure."

We hav heard a saying that a liar ought to hav a good memory, but we hesitate to quote it for Mr. Howe's benefit until he has had the opportunity to explain. These are his statements:

"I hav had sittings with Walter E. Reid for independent slate-writing."

"Under these conditions" [enumerated in his letter to the Spiritual Instructor] the slates were all filled with messages."

"In every case it was a total failure."

We hav several times urged upon Spiritual and Material writers the desirability of accuracy of statement. At the first blush these variations of Mr. Howe would seem to emphasize our admonition.

Different Methods of Obtaining Wealth.

Mr. Dana, of the New York Sun, in a two-line editorial, lays down this rule for acquiring a worldly competence:

"One rule for getting rich is to mind your own business."

Mr. Pentecost, of the Twentieth Century, has found another method. He says:

"When poor people will no longer become policemen nor soldiers, then poor people will be free; and when poor people are free, they will be no longer poor."

If the Sun's rule is true, why are not all those who do mind their own business above want; and if Mr. Pentecost's words are true, why are not all who abstain from joining the army and the police force in the same condition?

Is it possible that both philosophers are wrong?

A POLITICIAN named Rice, out in Kansas, is accusing the Hon. J. K. Ingalls, of that state, of being a blasphemer, for having once, in a philosophical mood, remarked, "No doubt that in the search for eternal truth another Christ will come, and another revelation be made." This is heresy without question, but scarcely blasphemy, as blasphemy is nowadays defined, and we do not believe it will greatly affect Mr. Ingalls's political chances.

MOSES HARMAN in his prison cell is becoming rather monkishly ascetic. In the language of the plains, he has been rounding himself up. As he puts it, he has spent much of his time in self-examination, and has instituted "a comparison between the actual, the factual, the sensuous, the visible, the provisional, and the transitional M. Harman, on the one hand, and the ideal, the supersensuous, the invisible, the spiritual, and (as I think) the permanent and the real M. Harman, on the other hand." The villainous use of the Comstock law has compassed many hardships, and its users hav much to answer for, but if they drive this innocent old man into the "realm of the visionary, the fanciful, the unphilosophical," their sins will be many times multiplied. Circulate the petitions for his pardon, and send them here or to Dr. Foote, 120 Lexington avenue, this city.

Letters from Friends.

FITCHVILLE, O., Aug. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav quite an assortment of Freethought reading on hand, and will send packages of it to anyone that will send postage. MRS. MARY MARTIN.

MARYVILLE, MO., July 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The paper suits me. I could not do well without it. I believe it is the duty of every man that is loyal to this noble republic to support it, for it is undoubtedly one of the best papers published. R. B. KELLY.

PALISADE MINES, CALISTOGA, Aug. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you a renewal and a new subscriber. I also send for the picture book. By this you will see I am in favor of the pictures. I do not believe I should hav subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER in the first place, as I was taking other Liberal papers, but the pictures I said at once are worth the subscription. Besides, I find THE TRUTH SEEKER a most valuable paper, and my children are always anxious to see it. Wishing you a long and successful career, I remain,

Yours truly, R. F. GRIGSBY.

WAGNER, ORE., July 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You may put me down for the picture book as soon as it is ready; also for the old TRUTH SEEKER as long as I liv or it livs.

Mr. Putnam was with us the Fourth of July and gave us two rousing lectures, and the oration, which was well received by all but a few would-be Christians, who did all they could to disturb the meetings. But all went off well, and he delivered his lectures to nearly three hundred people, most of whom are Liberals. I tell you, Samuel Putnam is an old war-horse, and is doing a good work. A good Liberal lecturer could do well to locate somewhere in eastern Oregon. WARREN CAESNER.

CHEWSVILLE, MD., Aug. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Can you allow me to inquire through THE TRUTH SEEKER for a piece of poetry entitled, "The God and Devil of Orthodoxy?" It was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER in the year 1876, I think. I hav lost the paper that had it in and would like very much to get another copy of it. I will giv you a few lines:

If the story of God and the Bible be true,
Who made the old devil and taught him to talk
And deceive Mother Eve whilst taking a walk?
He curses the woman, then he curses the man;
Oh, where is the wisdom in all of his plan?

Will some subscriber who has a file of the paper please send the poem or a copy to an old subscriber?

JOHN H. HARP.

GREELEY, COL., Aug 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to say a few words in favor of your journal, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I must say that it contains some of the most interesting articles I ever read. A man can learn more from it, obtain more good, than from the whole of the Bible. I only trust it will hav a broad field; that every bigot may read it properly before he commences to condemn it. I was two years ago a devout Christian. I dreamed of heaven and hell. I made myself unhappy by such a belief. All Liberalists must feel that they hav taken a burden off their shoulders when they hav completely thrown aside the Christian religion. In conclusion, I shall do all in my power to help the sale of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours truly, A. M. BROWNE.

JARBOESVILLE, MD., Aug. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Send me by mail the "Age of Reason," by Thomas Paine—the high-minded, honorable, far-seeing Thomas Paine, who gave his all, his money and intelligence and time, to help feed and clothe Washington's army. Without the honorable Thomas Paine Washington's efforts were useless. From what little information of Paine I hav in my place I find he was honored by Congress with money; honored by the legislatures and governors of several states, and given a homestead of three hundred acres, with the necessary buildings, in Massachusetts. His grave was violated, and his bones were taken to England, where a monument was intended to be erected to his memory. With those laurels bestowed upon him, I think it is advisable for our religious ministers to let his name rest, for the great good he has done. GEORGE W. FISH.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., Aug. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: This day the remains of Martha Sheen, daughter of James Sheen, were interred at the New Cemetery, Pleasantville. Before the funeral cortege left the house a very affecting address was delivered by John W. Shaw, ex-president of the Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia, to the parents and friends assembled to pay their last respects to the departed; and appropriate exercises were conducted at the tomb by the same gentleman. Mr. Sheen and his wife are both pronounced Liberals and hav educated their children upon the rational basis of Freethought. It was pleasing to note the unqualified affection reciprocated between the parents and the children; and the untiring devotion of the mother during the protracted illness of the daughter just passed away, was a theme upon the lips of all who know them.

One person present quoted most appropriately the lines:

If they hav acted well their part
Through changing sheen and shine;
Then let me ask my erring heart,
How hast thou acted thine?

Mr. and Mrs. Sheen are almost alone in their adhesion to Freethought principles in Atlantic City, and hav had to contend with many assailants, who are compelled to acknowledge the particularly striking evidences of a successful domestic government united by a love that knows no fear.

A FRIEND.

BLAINE, WASH., Aug. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: We hav just had a course of three lectures from Mr. Reynolds at the Opera House in Blaine. The house was packed to its utmost capacity each night, and the attention given to the speaker more than proved the interest taken in the subjects—"Liberalism," "The Lord's Prayer in our Public Schools," and "Why the Cross above the Flag?"

A most cordial invitation was extended to the clergy of Blaine to meet him in a friendly discussion before the public, offering to giv anyone one-half the time, and take up a collection. No one accepted the challenge, and the able scoffer at Christian absurdities left the field victorious. Christians would do well to consider such challenges, as they are given in a kindly spirit. Besides, it givs the Christian a better chance to reach a class of citizens who hardly ever or never go inside a church.

Come again, Mr. Reynolds.

With best wishes for THE TRUTH SEEKER and Heston,

JOHN MERRITT, JR.

PARKDALE, TORONTO, CAN., July 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER, I believe, the whole time since its publication in New York, and I hav tried hard to get subscribers for it. But I always lived among such a God-fearing people that I hav never been able to get you a subscriber. They hav plenty of money to giv away for error and superstition, but they hav none for such common-sense works as THE TRUTH SEEKER, as the sequel will show. About two years ago the Methodists built here a new brick church, which cost about ten or fifteen thousand dollars. But since that time the Presbyterians hav built a much larger and handsomer one, which took the shine out of the Methodist one. But the Methodists were determined not to be outdone as to having a big joss-house. So they went to work and built a new one, corner of King street and Dubb avenue, which cost, with—as the Scotchman would say—the box of whistles, $74,000. It was opened on the first Sunday in this month for what they call public worship. And they imported from your great city two great joss-house priests to draw the shekels out of the pockets of the poor dupes. One was the Rev. Dr. Peck, the other the Rev. Dr. Sutherland. And the first day of the performance they realized $22,000 in promises. Was not that a high day for the joss-house men, supposing the dupes toe the mark at the appointed time? Perhaps some of your readers may wish to know what has become of the old joss-house. Well, it is closed, and, like the temples of old, the oracle speaks no more. Yours truly, J. D. GREAVES.

MAZO MANIE, WIS., Aug. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Aside from the more important and highly interesting matter which we find in THE TRUTH SEEKER, to me it is very interesting to note the various views of the many TRUTH SEEKER correspondents on the various subjects which are discussed in its columns. To note how nearly they come to one's own views sets a person thinking which is right. Among these, none so truly coincided with my views of the Christian church as the sentiment and main object of the Women's National Liberal Union. It is a highly important truth, as expressed at the Women's National Liberal convention, that nothing short of Christianity's entire disintegration will mentally free its supporters, and that it still persists in holding its supporters in profound mental slavery. It was very gratifying to me, and should be to every true Liberal, to see the Women's National Liberal Union take such a decided stand in the foremost rank of advanced Liberalism. As a general thing, woman is mentally worse enslaved than man. The general mass of women are the greatest force against Liberalism and the great sustaining force of the church. Thus we may look at it as a very hopeful sign of our time to see the leading intelligent women of our country occupy such an advanced position.

Again, amongst the many communications on man's immortality, both in THE TRUTH SEEKER and many other papers and magazines which I hav read for the last ten years, only one person during that time came anywhere near my views of Spiritualism, and that is La Roy Sunderland, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 5th last. But mine is only an experience of ten years. JOHN LEITCH.

FENTONVILLE, MICH., Aug. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find post-office order for $5, for which please send the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER for another year, and the pictorial book as soon as finished. I hav all THE TRUTH SEEKERS bound since the pictures commenced, but I want them in book form for the benefit of my Christian friends. I hav a little granddaughter. She has to see the pictures as soon as the paper arrives. So you see I am in favor of them. Please keep them up as long as possible. I am in my sixtieth year, but you can count on me as long as I liv and hav my liberty. I had a neighboring minister call on me some time ago to hav a friendly talk with me about the other world. He found some fault with me because I worked Sunday. I told him that I was willing to work for a living, and that if God knew one-half as much as people claimed, he knew that it was impossible for me to do all my work in six days, and he had no right to ask of me a thing I could not do. In our conversation he called me an Infidel. "Well," I said, "if the Bible is true, there is one class of men worse than they." He said, "Who?" I said, "The man that did not provide for his family." He soon had to go and see a sick man, and he has never been to see me since, but has left his wife with her father and gone East. After he had been away a short time he wrote to the Masonic lodge for a demit, but our lodge thought that, if he was good enough for a minister, he was not good enough to be a Mason. I hope the grand old TRUTH SEEKER may liv until every man that fights potato-bugs and takes good care of the crop, and is lucky enough to get one to eat, will dare to eat it without first stopping to ask God to bless it. S. H. ELLINWOODS.

CEDARVILLE, N. J., Aug. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I wish that THE TRUTH SEEKER was read by the people generally, as it would teach them more truth than they can get from any amount of pulpit exhortations, explanations, and detonations. But the Christians are as shy of anything that does not accord with what they learned at Sunday-school as a crow is of a string, and there is just about as much reason in one case as the other, as neither will investigate and find out the real danger contained in the scarecrow. Therefore it is very difficult to get believers to read anything that is Liberal, and that would cause them to reason or think for themselvs.

Hoping the day will soon come when gospel shops will hav to pay their share of taxes like other corporations and individuals, and when Comstock and Wanamaker, with their tools and emissaries, are cast out, and the glorious principle of civil and religious liberty will be a reality, and not a sham as it is now, and hoping that you may hav ample support in your endeavors for the enlightenment and betterment of the human race, I remain,

Yours truly, H. E. EMMAL.

BYRON, MINN., July 26, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for one new subscriber; the balance please place to my credit. This gentleman whose name you will place on your list of readers, is, I am happy to say, one of the best and most successful business men in this city. Commencing as a clerk, his energy, integrity, and manliness won for him, as they are bound to do for all men and individuals, success and happiness—and they are, I believe, the only key to happiness. He is also blessed with a lovely wife and two beautiful and intelligent little girls. I am glad to hav such people identify themselvs with our cause as leaders. The other kind will fall in line as soon as it becomes popular, as the Christians hav always done with all moral questions, never improving until compelled by common-sense and reason, and then crediting it to their Gods.

I cannot understand how an intelligent person can bless an all-wise, unlimited (?) God, as the Christians call him, for all good, and not hold him responsible for all evil, for if he is able to produce the good, he must of necessity be able to prevent the evil. Now I ask in all earnestness, how is it possible to look at it in any other light? I cannot.

I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. J. E. Remsburg at Waterville, Minn., and attended his lectures. The audience was delighted with the manner he handled his subjects, especially the Sunday question, when he offered to meet any minister in a debate and affirm that there was not a text in the Bible authorizing us to keep Sunday as a holy day, or as the Sabbath. The reverends did not come to the front as the Christians supposed they would. I suppose they were too busy with pastoral calls to pay attention to a Freethinker. At any rate, none of them showed up. I also heard the wonderful (?) Talmage. The difference between Mr. Remsburg and Mr. Talmage is: the former affirmed with facts and proofs, the latter affirmed with faith and no proofs. Well, I suppose Mr. Talmage thinks that the Western people should not question anything that he would say. Well, we should not be too particular, as he was paying up a judgment that the people of Waseca held against him. Will you kindly send me Mr. Remsburg's lectures on "The Sunday Question," "Bible Morals," and "Thomas Paine."

WALTER A. JOHNSON.

GORDONVILLE, TEX., Aug. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hope that you will allow me, through the columns of your most excellent journal, to reply to a few remarks in your last issue, in which the man who proves all things, F. C. Ormsby, attacks my profession very fiercely. But, in the first place, I am very much surprised to find a man who is so much wiser than I ever thought any man could be—that is, to know positivly and even prove that there is a life of immortality and intelligence, will-power, consciousness, or mind of human individualities beyond the grave. I did not know that a finite being could comprehend such infinities. But I hope that he will allow me to sanction the last sentence of his first paragraph—that is, that there is no such thing as belief in his idea of continued life. Now, as he has no confidence in it, I hope that he will allow me the same privilege; but I do not claim as much as he does in the following sentence. He says that a man must know the fact, must hav positiv proof. I only claim that I must hav some evidence, some proof, before I believe it.

Now, as regards his assertion that the medical profession feeds upon the ignorance and fear of the people, it is as false as it is groundless; the most intelligent and fearless people we hav employ physicians. The other assertion, that physicians keep people under the weather, as he calls it, for the purpose of bleeding them of all the cold cash they think they can get, is as untrue and as unprincipled as the above.

The medical profession does not claim to be a cure-all, but it does in many instances claim to abort disease, in others to abbreviate, and in others to alleviate all of the pain, suffering, and misery that we can.

It is quite true that there are people so ignorant that they think an M.D. can cure every patient as soon as he visits the same, and in case the patient does not get up immediately, they are so short-sighted and of so little principle themselvs that they think that the M.D. is keeping the patient down in order to make money out of the case. With all good-will and highest regards for the man personally, I would ask how the above assertions agree with his motto in the beginning. D. J. TUCKER, M.D.

RED CANON, WYO., Aug. 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 9th Mr. Ormsby styles the medical profession a humbug on a par with the clergy. True, there are many men professing to be medical that are gross humbugs. This is partly due to the reckless way in which state legislatures hav allowed the establishment of medical colleges of low grade. The writer remembers several classmates who for mental incapacity and indolence were dropped from the class; they went the next year to an easy-going college that granted them diplomas several months earlier than their previous classmates obtained theirs, and to-day men who did hard and honest work are classed in the profession at large with these drones.

When human life is reposed in the care of any man that man should be proved competent to apply the highest scientific skill in the case.

Before a man is allowed to run a locomotiv good engineers should determin whether or not he is competent. Mr. Ormsby intimates that any man ignorant of chemistry should be allowed to prescribe medicins.

Suppose such a man should prescribe a combination of iodide of potassium and chlorate of potassium for one of his family, and death from the poisonous iodate formed should result, perhaps Mr. Ormsby's views would change somewhat.

Volumes could be written enumerating the deaths resulting from an unwise use of drugs, and more than this, the tenth part of such accidents was never known.

In almost every other house there is a book called the "Family Doctor," and it causes more sickness than it ever cures. Not long since the writer attended a case in which the heart sack was distended with a dropsical effusion. Pain was felt in the stomach region. The family consulted "Dr. Quack's" book. It recommended a half-teaspoonful of chloroform in alcohol with water. The writer arrived just in time to prevent the giving of this medicin, which would hav been sufficient to hav stopped the already feeble and crippled heart.

As long as Dr. Quack is allowed to publish and sell his medical guides; as long as conceited old women who hav not even a high-school education think they know it all, physicians will be required to stand between these vampires and their victims.

It is not alone the religions that contain all the superstition.

Nearly every old granny has a memory jammed full of traditions that are as sacred to her as the words of the Bible, and just as the policeman is made a necessity by the thief, so physicians are required to arrest rampant conceit wielding deadly weapons in its blindness. DR. BOYNTON.

MILL BROOK, CONN., Aug. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $5 to renew my subscription for two years. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER so long that I hav come to consider it one of the indispensables, although you treat what I consider a sacred and all-important subject rather unfairly, as it seems to me. I refer to Spiritualism.

It is well known that no inconsiderable number of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are Spiritualists. In view of this fact, the attitude you assume toward Spiritualism seems strange.

In your "Search for a Spirit" you were evidently looking for something you did not wish to, and were determined not to find. Respect for the memory of your illustrious predecessor, D. M. Bennett—who, if not an open and avowed Spiritualist, was very favorably inclined toward Spiritualism—should, it would seem, hav induced you much earlier to hav looked into the matter and given it a thorough investigation instead of waiting these many years, and then, rather reluctant, giving it only a cursory examination. And furthermore, in order to neutralize, it would seem, the effect of McArthur's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 24th, appears, immediately following it, a very silly piece against Spiritualism from a German paper. None so blind as those that won't see. This may seem rather plain talk, but you will remember that Solomon says, "Faithful are the wounds of a friend, but the kisses of an enemy are deceitful" (Prov. xxvii, 6). "He that rebuketh a man, afterward shall find more favor than he that flattereth with the tongue" (Prov. xxviii, 23).

And now, Mr. Editor, as advice is in order, and cheap in the market, I want your advice on a difficult and nice question. I am a lawfully born citizen of these United States, and for many years I hav peacefully hoed my garden, milked my cow, fed my pig, paid my taxes, and so helped to sustain this glorious government. One of my neighbors is postmaster here, and keeps the post-office in one corner of his kitchen. I go to the office in the morning for my mail, or to deposit letters, and before I open the door I hear a mumbling, which I hav learned is the postmaster in the process of emitting prayer inside our post-office, and I must wait for him to finish before I enter. Meantime the weeds are growing in my garden, the pig is squealing for his breakfast, and the cow is waiting to be milked. Now, the question in my mind is, Has a postmaster any right to hold a prayer-meeting in a government post-office and keep me waiting outside till the performance is over? If not, hav I a right to march in and ask for my mail?

The great Washington has told us that ours is a purely secular government; but under the Sunday-school régime of Cheap John Wanamaker, it is becoming a question whether the church runs the government or the government runs the church, and perhaps the department has instructed country postmasters to open their offices with prayer. I suspect, however, that my pious neighbor is unlawfully depriving me of my right to get my letters without having to wait till they are prayed over. Until I hear from you, I shall refrain from violent measures, but I wish here and now to record my protest against being locked out of the post-office in order that the postmaster may indulge in prayer or any other foolish habit, and I hope that this protest will meet your hearty approval. H. W. PINNEY.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOME, Aug. 10, E.M. 290.

MR. EDITOR: Of late circumstances hav been so suggestiv and opportune for me to again communicate matters of interest through our valuable Freethought organ that duty has again influenced me to write to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, and the matters of interest are so varied that I fear I shall overlook some.

The first of which I will speak is in regard to the management of our home. There is such a prostitution of individuality, so much sycophancy, such love for domineering, such a respect for bigoted officials, that I am astonished that the American Revolution was a success, unless the love of liberty was more unanimous then than now. Suffice it to say that we are under a dominion as strict as that of the czar of Russia, and the majority I believe are afraid (I know of no other reason) to sign a petition or raise a voice in protest against such disciplin, and when one does he is proscribed. So it is that we who fought for the liberties of others hav lost our own, and a great many seem to consider it a blessing. Our superintendent even told me he did not allow us to talk upon religion or politics, but I told him I should not be intimidated from performing my duty. I hav been favored of late with a sample copy of Freethought. I am circulating it throughout our camp. I think it an excellent document for missionary work. I hav also been favored with Brother Shaw's Independent Pulpit, from Waco, Tex., and oh, how I regret that I am not able to take it and encourage him. Were I able I would write a book entitled, The Sin of Belief. What an evil belief has been!

Last Sunday there was a meeting begun in Quincy in the interest of the Prohibition party, carried on by a Rev. Mr. Bolds, A. J. Streator, and Mrs. Lathrop, of New York. Mr. Bolds was a man of considerable ability, and I think altogether too intelligent and Liberal to remain in the church long unless his services are confined to districts where the people are in a low state of evolution. He showed conclusivly that the church, pulpit, press, politics, and legislation are all subsidized to the liquor traffic. He solicited questions. I wrote and handed in three: "1. If Prohibition succeeds will it not cause a financial crash?" He answered affirmativly, but argued that the crash would be more than justified by the benefits resulting therefrom. "2. Can Prohibition be enforced while intoxicating liquor is allowed to be sold as a medicin?" This was answered sophistically. "3. Is not the Prohibition of intoxicating liquor a usurpation of natural rights?" This he answered affirmativly and argued negativly, showing conclusivly he failed to comprehend the question. Yesterday Mr. ——, gaining encouragement by Mr. Bolds's experiment, also solicited questions, announcing that if desired there would be an opportunity of discussion after he was through speaking. I accordingly took my pencil and made the following notes, but before he was half through I perceived he was too vile and ill-mannered for any use, so I did not confront him. He says: "1. True government consists in religious character and political action. 2. It must be the effect of moral and religious forces." Then he flattered us all that we were too good Christians to belong to a party that would favor high license. I was attending the meeting with mutual sympathy in politics, hoping that their efforts might be crowned with success, and I yet hope for the same, because I realize that the vulgar to whom they appeal are touched by their sentimentality and overlook their lack of logic and reason. And as their object is only chimerical, and educational, and mostly temporary and finally to be a failure only in giving the participants exercise and a livelihood, and inasmuch as illogical reasoning and unphilosophical statements serve their purpose for their class, such unscrupulous hypocrits who are out of employment and depending on the public are perhaps doing the best they can. I thank them one and all because they take a delight in boycotting the preachers and one another. It may be that they may convince some little child that it had better stay away from the saloon or some girl that she had better not fall in love with a tippler and marry him, and maybe in their zeal they gain the sympathy of some one who will combine earnestness with logic. But as yet, if these are a sample of their leaders, they are a disgusting lot. Well, I am glad they giv the preachers and the church hell, and sometimes, unavoidably and accidentally, the Bible—the enemy of man, woman, and child, as well as all reform.

EX-REV. J. N. MAXEY.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Aug. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Brother Wettstein, July 26th, expends more attention upon Spiritists than is justifiable on any ground that we should undertake the much-needed but hopeless task of reforming them. We sometimes hear of a Christian being reclaimed and becoming a rational Freethinker, but I hav yet to hear of a Spiritist being so fortunate. That is an indication that Spiritism is a more bewildering delusion than Christianity and its victims are more blindly bigoted than Christians. Their method of confuting Materialists is illustrated in a wrangle I recently had with one of them in THE TRUTH SEEKER, that, being apropos, is worth recapitulating.

In my introductory letter on matter, motion, and planetary formation, I accepted the proposition that science is knowledge; recognizing science and knowledge to be synonyms; and suggested that, unless theories are the logical import of ascertained facts, they are evidently not science, but vagaries. Judging popular theories by that definition, I lost confidence in them in early youth and hav not found it yet. I think it should be obvious to any person of average intelligence that the last sentence cannot logically be applied to science and knowledge, but to popular theories that are proved by science and knowledge to be vagaries. I subsequently presented good reasons for rejecting some of them, and am prepared to deal with others in like manner.

At the conclusion of my letter, I incidentally suggested some problems of vital importance to Spiritism that Spiritology involves. My letter was responded to by a Spiritist over the signature of J. R. Perry, who, though he assumed that Spiritism is the main question at issue, instead of endeavoring to solve the problems that Spiritology presents, evaded the issue with the irrelevant and false charge of my stating that I lost confidence in science in early youth and hav not found it yet. When subsequently forced to the wall for a solution of the problems, he reluctantly admitted his ignorance of the subject, but thinks himself competent to instruct others.

In my response I noted his misquotation, and corrected by repeating my statement verbatim, and added the suggestion that any person of average intelligence should logically infer that I lost confidence, or never had any, in popular theories that hav the evidence of being but vagaries. In response, he asserts that I failed to state one misquotation; though I really noted several of them, and suggested that they being evidently not the result of ignorance or accident, we should charitably impute them to idiocy or insanity. Mr. Perry appears to hav thought it more unbecoming "to whip the devil around a stump" than to distinctly charge him with willful lying, as he evidently desired me to do, and giv him a pretense to wail like a spanked baby or howl like a kicked cur, in the hope of prejudicing disinterested spectators against me. That is evidently his highest trump card, and he plays it for all it is worth.

In Mr. Perry's last assault upon myself personally and direct, he charges me with stating at the outset that I never since a boy had any faith in science; and adds, "But it seems now that he meant, and should hav stated, that he had no faith in theories." It being obvious to my view that Mr. Perry is either morally or intellectually, or both morally and intellectually, incapable of making a truthful statement of his own volition, I wrote you a response at that time, in which I challenged him to name the date of your issue in which the statement he charges me with making occurs over my signature. I now renew that challenge.

If Mr. Perry objects to being "semi-occasionally disturbed" with unsavory compliments, he should not persistently insult others with his infamous defamatory lying and quibbling, that is neither ridicule nor satire but vulgar ruffianism of the most infamous type.

There was nothing in my introduction that could be made to serve as a pretense for, or justification of, the ruffianly assault that was made upon me. Perceiving that I had a ruffian to deal with, I hav dealt with him roughly, and shall continue to do so unto the end; and so long as his ruffianly assaults are repeated in THE TRUTH SEEKER I shall insist on my right of self-defense with counter assaults and shall not submit to being choked off like a dog, nor do I desire that Mr. Perry should be; for, if he has an intelligent self-respect, he should find it expedient to let go and drop off and no longer endeavor to bolster up, or divert attention from, an indefensible cause, with irrelevant, defamatory lying and quibbling.

In the darkest age of ignorance and ruffianism that disgraces the history of Europe, when to question the veracity of a lying ruffian was a signal for mortal combat, lying acquired the unmerited immunity from condemnation and just reproof that it now enjoys on the pretense that it is unparliamentary and unbecoming a gentleman to question a lying ruffian's veracity even indirectly. But it is not supposed to be unparliamentary nor unbecoming a gentleman of culture to lie and quibble. That is giving defamatory lying and quibbling more advantage than it is justly entitled to; better make it so unpopular that even Spiritualists will be ashamed to practice it. Probably Mr. Perry will call that another "Jesuitical fling." But it being a time-honored church dogma that a lie well stuck to is as good as the truth, I shall respectfully submit that he has practically demonstrated himself to be far more Jesuitical than he has made me appear even by lying and quibbling.

In the foregoing I hav endeavored to avoid being personal, but confined myself strictly to the discussion of a principle of which Mr. Perry is a volunteer representativ and champion—and he is well adapted to his chosen vocation. His method of combat is beneath contempt; it has not even the questionable merit of plausible sophistry; and has no force but that it derives from the defamatory lying and quibbling. Though thoroughly disgusted with the line of defense that his infamous method of combat has compelled me to adopt, I shall endeavor to stay by him until he is satisfied that I can giv as good as I get and a liberal rate of interest, except of lying and quibbling. That is lower than I shall "stoop to conquer" or hav occasion to. For, in the estimation of intelligent and fair-minded people, defamatory lying will damage none but those who employ it; and I hav no regard for the esteem or censure of those who think that a talent for defamatory lying and quibbling is worth cultivating or encouraging. J. A. TUTTLE.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Proverb.

There is a proverb in a heathen tongue
Which often strikes us as much more sublime
Than sayings which a wiser day hath sung,
And well to be remembered in our time.

'Tis this: All persons carry two huge sacks,
One is behind, in front the other rests;
One holds their own faults—this is on their backs;
One holds their neighbors'—this lies on their breasts.

So they look down and see each neighbor's ill,
And cry, 'tis foul, but all the while are blind
To their own faults which, growing daily, fill
That baser burden which rests on behind.

A Bit of Philosophy.

In the Christian world much diversity of opinion exists as to which creed or form of worship is most acceptable to deity, and although creeds seem to increase and multiply, church membership is most assuredly on the decline. Popular forms of religion are looked upon by many as popular forms of superstition and error. Current theology no longer satisfies the cravings of the thinking mind Truth, being the most sacred thing in existence, is eagerly sought for by all thoughtful people.

But, in the midst of such a multitude of conflicting opinions, how truth is to be distinguished from error becomes the important question. It is a necessary or self-evident truth that space is boundless and duration endless, because the human mind can form no conception of either being limited.

We cannot think of a time when there was no time, or a place where there is no space. It is also true that something exists in space which the learned call matter.

Matter is of various kinds, and exists in an almost infinit variety of forms. It is capable of being divided and subdivided until its ultimate atoms are reached, when, it is said, all further division ceases. The simple elements of matter, which are said to be between sixty and seventy in number, are the source of all existence, animal, vegetable, and mineral.

There is no special human element, and all that can be said on behalf of the immortality of the soul of man applies with equal force to all the animal kingdom, and however much man may pride himself on his superior powers of intellect, the stubborn fact remains that he is related to and controled by similar laws to every living thing beneath him. Very many well-informed people claim that mind or spirit is not matter, and some isolated individuals maintain that the existence of matter can only be determined by the resistance which it offers to the touch when we attempt to grasp it. But it is an admitted fact that the rays of light and the fragrance of a flower consist of small particles of matter which offer no resistance to the touch. If, then, the rays of light and the fragrance of a flower be matter, surely that wonderful power that moves and controls the body, that feels, thinks, and remembers, that loves and hates, must be material.

Intelligence is not something separate and distinct from matter, but always associated with it.

Modern philosophers tell us that matter is eternal; that it never was created and never can be destroyed; that it always existed in some form or other, and always will continue to exist; that "omnipotence itself cannot produce something from nothing." Now we need not believe this statement on the authority of great men unless it meets with the approval of our own judgment. But we can not think of a time when nothing existed, nor can we conceive of something being produced from nothing. If we admit the creation of matter we destroy its eternity; creation implies a beginning, but eternity is without beginning or end.

It is self-evident that all existing forms must hav had a beginning and all existing forms must necessarily hav an end, but the matter or substance composing these forms never could hav a beginning and never can hav an end. Nature forms and transforms, but never creates. The word create has no place in the field of science, it is a term invented by theologians to sustain the theory of a personal God. But if a personal God exists, he, in common with other matter, forms a part of the boundless universe, and must of necessity be subject to its laws. Theologians preach the doctrin that the human race, at the period of death, enter upon a stationary existence from which there will be no change; but this childish idea has no foundation in fact or a shadow of proof to support it. In all the economy of nature nothing is stationary—everything is in a state of mutation. Nature is the almighty power that is everywhere present at the same instant of time, and if on some occasions she appears kind and compassionate, she at other times seems remorseless and cruel; if she covers the earth with verdure and causes trees and flowers to bloom in profusion, she produces the storm and tempest that sweep over the sea and land leaving death and destruction in their path, bringing sorrow and suffering to many. Her operations are not confined to any particular locality; they pervade the realms of boundless space, and will exist throughout the endless ages of eternity.

About Postal Cards.

In 1865 the Prussian postal authorities announced their intention of issuing a correspondence card on which brief communications not under seal or in an inclosure could be sent through the mails at greatly reduced rates. For some reason never fully explained the scheme hung fire and was, apparently, abandoned. In 1869 Austria took up the idea, and commenced the manufacture and sale of "correspondence cards," as they are still called on the European continent. Prussia immediately followed her, and, during the war with France, distributed the cards free to soldiers, and at a purely nominal price to soldiers' relativs. American postal cards made their appearance in May, 1873, since which time the sale has grown so rapidly that over 1,000,000,000 hav now to be manufactured every year.

The machinery used in making the postal cards, writes a correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat from Albany, N. Y., is the usual kind of paper-making machinery, and there are kept constantly in motion three washing engins, four beaters, and two sets of rollers. One set is used entirely for postal card work, and one for the finer grade of book-paper work for the government. Each day from four to seven tons of rags are used, besides a large quantity of wood pulp. The postal cards are made almost entirely from rags. The rags are carried from Castleton on the smallest railroad in the United States. It is a little single-track road connecting with the Hudson River railroad, and it runs around the hills to the mill. One locomotiv, one passenger car, and a postal car constitute the equipment of the miniature road.

This little train of cars carries away daily from the works two carloads of printed postal cards, all of which are brought to this city and thence distributed, according to the destination marked upon them, all over the country, in every post-office over which Uncle Sam has jurisdiction. To load a car requires between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 of the little cards, according to how they are packed. Three million cards make a large load, as a box containing 25,000 cards weighs 162 pounds. A thousand cards weigh about 5¼ pounds, or to be more exact, 1,000,000 cards weigh about 5,225 pounds. Climbing up the hill to the largest building one can easily follow the process by which postal cards are made. In a back room of the building can be seen a dozen girls whose sole duty is to sort the rags that come in from the collectors. The girls cut off all buttons and buckles on discarded garments and sort the rags into piles according to quality. The sorted rags are put into huge chopping machines, which cut them into small pieces. It then whiffs them into a dust machine, where they are shaken and cleaned. From this point they pass through a succession of baths in chloride of lime and various other bleaching and cleansings, with occasional visits to vats and trips through rollers with sharp knives on them.

After passing through all the different processes the rags come out in a fine white pulp as thin as flour paste. This is shaken over wire to get the water out, and is then put through a score or more of rollers and a glue bath, after which it is rolled out into postal-card paper. At the end of the long rolls that hav been squeezing the paper down and putting the gloss on it are the knives used for cutting, and the long sheet passing through it is either cut into sheets four postal-cards wide to be put into the huge automatic presses, or into sheets 21x30 1-2 inches. In the big room of the postal-card mill are about a dozen men and two dozen women, four large presses, four cutters, and one extra large cutter. The sheets are taken to the press, where they are given to the feeders, who on the Campbell presses feed forty-one sheets a minute, or 1,760 postal cards. The cards are printed from steel plates so hard that a file could not make an impression upon them. Each one is printed from a separate plate, and eighty plates are locked in the bed of the press. All the plates are sent from Washington, and one set of plates in continual use lasts about two years. The feeders are women of experience, and they receive 41 1-2 cents for feeding 100,000 cards, and can feed about 500,000 a day.

The sheets are next taken to the cutters, from which they are turned out in single cards. Three girls take the cards of each feeder. One counts twenty-five in each package, and the other two put on the paper binders. After they leave this room they are put up in packages, counted out in packages of twenty, and put into the pasteboard boxes, which by contract must be muslin-bound. Five girls put the muslin binding on the boxes, receiving for their work fifteen cents per hundred boxes. The boxes when filled are put into cases ready for shipment. No order for less than 500 cards is filled. Orders for 10,000 or more are packed in wooden cases, the largest single case holding 25,000 cards.

A new machine has recently been put into work on postal cards that will increase the rate of printing them and decrease the number of employees. Two of the machines are now in operation. They print from continuous rolls at the rate of 300 per minute. A set of knives cut them off and they drop into little cells; a set of steel fingers turn the package over. After each twenty-five cards hav dropped into a cell the fingers twine a band about the package and carry it back to the packing-room, where girls put them into boxes.

What Johnny Knows about Cats, Pigs, Donkeys, and Cows.

THE CAT.

A cat is a domestic animal what likes to be near a fire. When cats get vexed, they oist their backs like the hump of a camel, and their tails swell out like a foxes, and they scratch with the splinters in their feet. Cats are different to dogs. A dog wags its tail when it is pleased, a cat wags it when it is angry, that is the reason they don't get on. They hunt mice, birds, beetles, and other game. They do not sleep at night like any other sensible animal, but prowl about on back-yard walls, making horrid noises, and spitting and scratching one another. It was one of these animals what led pa to throw a whole chamber-service away, one still, clear, dark moonlight night. There was stillness all around after that. Cats are very fond of grannies, aunties, and such like. They cultivate whiskers, but not mustaches. A cat is the only animal what has nine lives.

THE PIG.

The pig is a animal what speaks with a grunt, and is fond of wallowing in the mire. Pigs do not wear hair on their backs like other animals, but bristles. Black puddings and other things what we see on the stalls on a market day come from the pig. So does sausage, but not German sausage. When they talk about pigs in the Bible they call them swine. Bible pigs were fed on husks, but English pigs are fed on porridge and other refuse. A pig when it is dead is called bacon, and is then cured. Fried bacon is a common article of food for breakfast. The fat what comes from fried bacon is good for children.

THE DONKEY.

A donkey is a animal what has four legs. It has also longer ears than the horse or and other animal. The tail of a donkey is generally all meat, hair does not grow thereon. They are very stupid animals, that is the reason our schoolmasters call us little donkeys sometimes. A donkey is very often like a woman—when it says it won't go, it won't, and they are very hard done to. Some good, kind people are called donkeys, and that is how Jerusalem donkeys were made, but the greatest quantity come from the seaside places where they earn their own living like any other man. Donkeys feed on commons, and other places where there is no food, and thus they are termed common donkeys. A donkey what is not a donkey, is called a ass.

THE COW.

A cow is a animal what has four legs. Cows are made of different colors, black, white, yellow, and crushed strawberry color. The milk what we get in a morning comes from the cow. The milk is fixed in between the last two legs of a cow. I hav noticed that a black cow givs white milk. We get roast beef from this animal. The boots we wear are made from the skin of a cow. A male cow is called a bull, but bulls do not giv milk, as this is a law of nature. Tripe and all those sort of luxuries come from this animal. I like tripe. The cow, like the donkey, has a meat tail with a bunch of hair at the bottom. They do not shoe cows like they do donkeys.

IT appears from late information that the stories of some persons being shut up in insane asylums by designing relativs are not fables, but that the thing is actually done not unfrequently.

THE sects continue to fight over the obtaining of government patronage in Indian schools, to which neither hav a just claim. Indian Commissioner Webb is assailed by Catholics for favoring Protestants.

AMONG the late acts of the Italian government the one that most angers Catholics is the closing and confiscation of the Church of the Bergamaschi, which enshrines "a miraculous image" of "Our Blessed Mother."

THE official report on management of ecclesiastical property delivered in the Italian parliament, states that up to July, 1889, the government had sold property recovered from the church to the value of 650,000,000 lire, and restored to families 150,000,000 lire which had been wrenched from them by unjust clerical influence.

ENGLAND has just had naval maneuvers costing £200,000. They were to test the possibility of an enemy holding for ten days control of the trade routes and thus cutting off England's food supplies. The British navy behaved poorly and exposed defectiv and antiquated machinery and general degeneracy. The enemy would hav won, and pessimists predict England's fall in her next war.

A RELIGIOUS fight worthy of the Middle Ages was recently narrowly averted in Russia. The village of Ikhty has a statue of the Virgin which attracts pilgrims and profit, but the village of Matvinora claimed it as having been revealed first to a dweller there. The peasants of the villages, about four thousand each, with the clergy at their head, were about to join battle, when a circuit justice arrived and persuaded them to peace.

THE troubles over cemeteries in Chili hav been ended by mutual concession. The Catholics formerly controled the burial-grounds and refused to admit those not of their faith. The government organized public cemeteries. Catholics interdicted the latter to Catholics, and the government retaliated by interdicting the Catholic cemeteries to anyone. Catholics then had to bury their dead secretly at midnight to elude prosecution.

TROUBLE on the New York Central railroad is yet threatening. Knights are deliberating a strike on all Vanderbilt's roads, which will involve the West. The contention is whether sixty men were dismissed for incapacity and lack of work for them, or for being activ Knights. The men are blacklisted, and their organization urges that they hav been wronged. The New York Central Labor Union cites the threats of Governor Seymour in 1862 to seize a New York state railroad and operate it at cost prices for the benefit of the people, if the Vanderbilts did not conclude a strike and resume the service of the public in twenty-four hours. The strike was ended in an hour, and as late rulings on the powers of Congress in interstate commerce are supposed to giv it authority, that body is requested by the Central Labor Union to seize and operate the New York Central.

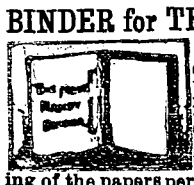
TRY-SQUARE:



OR,

The Church of Practical Religion.
BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

For sale at this office. Price, $1.00.

BINDER for THE TRUTH SEEKER

THE MARTYRDOM OF MAN.

A COMPENDIUM OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY.

By WINWOOD READE.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill.—[Literary World.

You turn over his pages with a fascination similar to that experienced in reading Washington Irving.—[Inter-Ocean.

His history has a continuity, a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—[New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—[Penn Monthly.

THE TRUTH SEEKER also reprints from reviews and magazines the latest papers of such eminent writers as CHARLES BRADLAUGH, PROFESSOR HUXLEY, FREDERIC HARRISON, and other English Liberal writers.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S "Children's Corner," MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, has been elected senior member of the School Board of Fall River, Mass.

The Truth Seeker Gives all the News of Freethought, and is Always on Guard Against the Encroachments of Ecclesiastics upon the People's Liberties.

If you have any Ideas or Reforms calculated to benefit humanity write to THE TRUTH SEEKER (sending your subscription) and let the world know of them. THE TRUTH SEEKER publishes each week more letters from the people than any other paper in the world.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is devoted to the defense of Mental Liberty, of American Institutions, and the Preservation of the United States Constitution, so far as regards religious tests, and the maintenance of human rights. It advocates the abolition of all laws based on religion or religious observances. It demands the taxation of church property. It is uncompromisingly opposed to anything tending toward a union of church and state, either in name or in fact.

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indescretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT.

"Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address,

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second that he fulfills all has agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would have been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Presbyterians of Spokane recently sold their church to a man who at once started a saloon in the basement, and now there is seen a beer sign on the corner of a fine structure with a tall steeple on it, but the Lord sends no lightning to destroy it.

THE city council of Denison, Tex., has forbidden the reading of the Bible or the performance of any religious exercises in the public schools of that city. Mr. Murray, of the Gazetteer of that place, is no doubt considerably to blame for this sensible and just action.

THE "Bald Knobbers" of southern Missouri who created such a stir by whipping and killing persons whom they did not like hav again made their influence felt, this time in the political contest for county offices. The name of the county that they infest is "Christian."

A RECENT London dispatch says: "The exaction of tithes for the support of the established church contiuues to excite much opposition in Wales, and at a sale under distraint in Montgomeryshire a few days ago, the chief constable was struck, and the auctioneer repeatedly kicked by a mob. The sale, however, was persisted in, and the amount distrained for recovered."

ACCORDING to the New York Sun, the growing sentiment in the Protestantism of today "demands the abolition of hell." The Catholic Union and Times asks: "What then will become of the devil; what will progressiv Protestantism do with him? Drive him into the Chautauqua swine and drown him in the lake. We rather think it is progressiv Protestantism that will be abolished."

THE World asks, "How long will the anachronism and injustice continue which compel New Yorkers to violate some statute in order to get needed and innocent recreation on Sunday?" and the American Sentinel answers: "It will continue as long as the state attempts to compel people who hav not a religious regard for Sunday to act as though they had. As it stands, the law is utterly useless; and serves only to breed contempt for all law."

A POCKET telephone has been introduced in Berlin. The idea on which its use is based is that electric bells are found everywhere, and there is no reason why they should not be used for telephoning as well. The pocket elephone is to be connected to the bell wires of hotels and hospitals as well as private houses, and it is claimed that people will be able to speak to distant places by simply taking their telephone out of their pockets as they would their watch.

THE "Law and Order" fanatics of Cincinnati seem to hav failed in their efforts to drive people to church. A correspondent of the Presbyterian Banner writes concerning a recent Sunday: "The concert in Eden park, one of a series instituted by the mayor, was attended, according to the computation of the daily papers, by at least twenty-five thousand people. The day was passed in various amusements, listening to the music of the brass band, baseball, and general rollicking."

THE world over Catholics, by order of the pope or church, refrain from eating meat on Friday lest they sin. The observation of Friday as a day for hanging murderers by Protestants, and as a day of fasting by Catholics, is due to the memory or belief that Christ died on Friday. By order of Pope Leo XIII. all Catholics were given permission to eat meat on Friday, August 15th. Without permission of the pope to thus eat meat is a sin; with the permission of the pope it is a blessing. The thoughtful man may ask where God comes in, but in view of the fact that churches rather than God are the umpires as to what constitutes sin, the edicts of popes are quite sufficient. The pope says he does thus at the solicitation of the bishops of many sees, who we suppose were urged on by butchers. It is said that this is the result of a wager of $10,000 made in September, 1888, by Phil Armour, of Chicago, that within two years from that date Catholics would be eating meat on Friday.—Advance Thought.

THE Buffalo Courier tells this story: At the gospel tent meeting on Niagara street a member had just ceased speaking about a cure of asthma effected by prayer when a lank individual arose and asked for the privilege of the floor. "If you hav any experience, you may speak, brother," said the presiding officer. "I hav had experience. My father was sick with the asthma for fifteen years, and he was finally brought to pray for his recovery. [Intense interest manifested among hearers.] He prayed fifty years, and [emphatically] he died of the asthma." Hysterical laughter among urchins on rear seats and consternation among the leaders.

THE Independent has been gathering statistics concerning church-membership in the United States; finding an aggregate of something over twenty-one million in a population of sixty-three million. The Chicago Times calls attention to these statistics in view of the demand to close the Columbian Exhibition on Sunday; two in three of the population not being church attendants at all, and nearly half of the remaining third being of some liberal faith and holding very tolerant views of the use of Sunday. It says, "The attempt of the Sabbatarian to enforce his peculiar views on this country is the attempt of a relativly small minority to coerce a mighty multitude."

THE will of J. H. Wade, probated at Cleveland, O., last week, directs that $500 per year be taken by his trustees for the promotion of liberal religion or spiritual philosophy, or both, or in the purchase of books and publications in furtherance of the same, and his trustees shall not be responsible to anyone for the manner in which they shall exercise this discretion, "provided, that no part of said funds shall be given, used, or appropriated for what is known as orthodox religion. Nor shall any of said funds be used for the benefit or support of any church or religion in which the blasphemous and detestable doctrin of eternal punishment or eternal punishment or eternal misery is encouraged, taught, or promulgated."

LAWRENCE GRONLUND denies, but a Voice reporter maintains that he did say these words in a recent interview: "I will be plain and say, Nationalism is a Boston 'fad,' and it will go the way of all 'fads.' There is, I am sorry to say, too much of the 'machine' in the Nationalist movement. Two men practically control the present Nationalist club in Boston, and I fear they are using it to forward their own ends. That club in turn controls all the other Nationalist clubs in the country." The Voice is a pious Prohibition paper. The editor adds to Mr. Gronlund's denial: "We regret that this misunderstanding has occurred between Mr. Gronlund and the Voice reporter. The reporter is quite positiv that he was only prohibited from quoting some names given him by Mr. Gronlund, and that the interview, as printed, is correct."

R. M. KING, Seventh Day Adventist, of Dyer county, Tennessee, whose case for Sunday-breaking has been appealed to the United States court, was arrested the third time on the 19th of last June and brought before the justice court. On this occasion he writes: "On the 15th of June, I went out in the morning, and hoed six rows of potatoes; worked just an hour, and then went to hear the Methodist minister preach. There was a state warrant taken out for me the next day for Sabbath-breaking, and I was arrested on the 19th, and taken before Squire Barker, tried, found guilty, and fined $5 and costs, whole amount $6.90. There was a man in the same neighborhood who cut wheat with a binder, on the same day, and worked the necessary hands to shock it, but there was no complaint made of his breaking the Sabbath. He was not a church-member."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Christian Register says: "In talking with a bright English lady visiting Boston, I asked her how the subject of cremation was regarded in England. She replied with evident horror that it was earnestly supported by many of the first physicians and surgeons of London, but that the church would never regard it as anything less than sacrilege to 'the temple of the Holy Ghost.' The body should be treated reverently, she said; nor could I persuade her that the solemn consigning of the body, after such religious services as might be desired, to the pure, rapid dissolution by heat was treatment far more reverent than that now so common, of allowing slow and abhorrent decay, attended by grave dangers to the living, to bring about the same result. She closed the conversation by saying, 'I fear the advancement of cremation must be left to the Freethinkers.' I could not repress the thought that to the Freethinkers of all ages the world owes most of the advancement of to-day."

OF the clergymen's determination to run the politics of this city the Sun says: "The trouble is that the clerical politicians will produce discord in their churches fatal to true religion. If the congregations are required to accept their political doctrins and their political leadership as they accept their religious teachings and pastoral authority, serious rebellion is sure to ensue. There is no particular political creed enforced by the standards of any church as a prerequisit to salvation and as a qualification for membership. Hence in every flock there are wide divisions of political opinion. Democrats, Republicans, mugwumps, professional reformers, Prohibitionists, and political cranks of every variety worship at the same altar. They are all sinners, but neither the more nor the less sinful, under their religious teachings, because of their opinions on politics. If, then, the parson sets out to separate them into sheep and goats, according as they agree or disagree with his own political notions and ambitions, and attempts to organize the church into a club of his party, will the house of God not be turned into a synagog of Satan? The clerical politicians will introduce a new element of war into the church. Religion and politics will be mixed up to the damage of each. If the parsons stick to the political business, they will hav to giv up the church; and if they would stick to the church, they will hav to go out of politics. Meantime the great body of citizens will remain fixed in their determination that in this republic the separation of church and state shall be complete."

THE myth of Tell and his adventures, which the Swiss government has ordered to be excised from the public school-books of Switzerland, is interesting, and important at present, because it is a type of more generally accepted myths that still receive the indorsement of many more powerful governments than that of Switzerland. We refer, says the San Francisco Freethought, to the God myth and the messianic myth. Anyone who will take the trouble to read the work called the Old Testament will find there recounted the marvelous exploits of a character called Jehovah, whose performances are located farther back in antiquity and are therefore more remarkable, and also on a larger scale, than those of Tell. They are likewise correspondingly unreasonable. In the New Testament a new hero called Christ, son of the foregoing, is introduced, of whom rather less startling adventures are recorded, but who is evidently of a similar mythological character. References to these two personages still occur in the text-books used in our public schools; and not only that, but pupils are required to perform certain incantations called prayers, and to chant certain prophecies called hymns, wherein the names of these fabulous characters are frequently mentioned. Much abler and more exhaustiv research than that employed in the Tell myth has been used to test the truthfulness of the accounts relating to these two legendary personages; the result being that the intelligence of the age rejects them as totally imaginary. No trace of their actual existence is to be discovered after the most patient and careful investigation. It is high time, therefore, that all governments maintaining a public school system should take a lesson from Switzerland, and exclude from all school-books published by authority the fanciful legends drawn from the biblical narrativs of oriental origin.

IN Winnebago county, Illinois, near Rockford, is a sort of heavenly hog harem, operated by a duffer named Jake Schweinfurth, who has made a number of healthy women believe that he is the second edition of Jesus Christ, so they hav given him land and all else they had, says Brick Pomeroy. As one of the results of the combine, there are already several children who are said to be due to an exclusiv operation of the Holy Ghost, with three or four more women wandering around as Virgin Marys, looking for cradles against coming wants. Twenty-four members of the Mount Zion family (this combination) hav written a letter, each saying that Jake is all right, and that: "We, as a church, believe that Jesus of Nazareth was conceived by the holy spirit of God; that the Virgin Mary did not bear the seed of man, but that the new life was a direct impartation from God, the invisible spirit. We also believe that this same God still livs, and that when he had clothed souls in robes of virgin white, he blessed some of them in precisely the same manner in which he blessed the holy Virgin of yore. We, with one voice, solemnly declare before God and man, that inside the church triumphant, or in this family, there has been no compromise of virtue and no traversing of the civil law of this fair country nor this our magnificent commonwealth. It is as far from us as is vice from virtue, to foster or tolerate aught that is condemned in our civil statutes." Meanwhile, the opponents to this new Mount Zion are looking for tar and feathers.

THE Kansas City Times reports: "Judge W. Henry, of the circuit court, who has just returned from Salt Lake City, where he spent a week, is emphatic in his disapproval of the practical workings of the Edmunds bill, passed two or three years ago. The bill known as the Edmunds bill, because it was conceived and pushed through the national Congress by the statesman from Vermont, provides for disincorporating the Mormon church and confiscating all its property except houses of worship. In its workings the bill is arbitrary and in defiance of constitutional rights, as viewed by Judge Henry. "Since the passage of the bill," said he yesterday, "the United States government has confiscated property belonging to the Mormon church amounting to $1,000,000 or more. It has seized the lands of the church, sold its farms, and even advertised its cattle for sale. In Salt Lake City to day the president of the Mormon church is renting the building in which he livs from the government. It is the president's mansion built by the church and confiscated by the government under the Edmunds bill. The property of the church was acquired under a charter granted by the territorial government of Utah and acquiesced in by the national government. The intent of the Edmunds bill was to crush and stamp out Mormonism, but as, prior to its passage, another bill had been passed prohibiting Mormonism, and it was already in effect, it seems to me that the passage of the latter was an act of oppression and injustice. The Supreme Court of the United States has declared it constitutional, however, so the government may continue its confiscation of property. I do not believe that such a course is calculated to check Mormonism."

Theism, Agnosticism, and Atheism.

The antagonism of these beliefs is not so fundamental as we hav been led to imagin by the attitude sometimes assumed toward one another.

Notwithstanding the belligerent attitude of these combatants, there is one fundamental point upon which there is a remarkable agreement.

Theism has a God behind the universe which is eternal, and fills immensity. That is, space is full of him, as he fills space. Agnosticism has an infinit universe, behind which is an infinit unknowable, which infinit unknowable is manifest in the infinit universe. This infinit unknowable is eternal—"without father or mother, beginning of days or end of life." Atheism has an infinit universe, which fills immensity. That is, infinit space is full. And hence the exclusion of an infinit God, seeing that infinit space is full of matter, or of material, and hence no room is left for an infinit God, or an infinit unknowable.

The agreement between these several three is, that each and all postulate an infinit—not only an infinit, but infinits—an infinit universe, infinit space, and these infinitly full. So far, at any rate, we hav a fundamental agreement. There is no disagreement which is really fundamental.

Theism has a boundless universe, which is full. Over this universe an infinit God presides. Agnosticism has the same—a universe infinitly full, ruled over by an infinit unknowable, as the infinit universe is the manifestation of that infinit unknowable, and hence the law in the universe by which it is to be interpreted is the manifestation of that infinit unknowable, and hence the rules of the infinit universe are the infinit unknowable. Atheism has a universe filled with eternal matter, or material, ruled over by infinit or immutable law.

An infinit incomprehensible, an infinit unknowable, an infinit immutable law—take your choice. If words mean anything, wherein lies the fundamental difference? In either case, postulations are made which are impossible to necessary human limitations. Theism and Atheism presume to differ in details, however, rather than in fundamentals. In fundamentals they are alike, as all these start in an impossible thought, or in a radical contradiction. Agnosticism cannot presume to differ with Theism rationally. It declares that the infinit unknowable, or infinit cause, is unthinkable, is incomprehensible. All agree that these infinits are incomprehensible, are unknowable, are eternal. How, then, in the name of reason, we ask, can a God incomprehensible, a God infinit, be, when an infinit number of material objects, not God, fill space? Mind implies limit. We hav no other knowledge of mind. Wherein lies the difference—for a limited mind to postulate an infinit, or an infinit unknowable, or postulate an infinit number of material objects (or, if you choose, immaterial objects) which fill infinit space? How does it come to pass that a limited mind can think infinit numbers and infinit space, and at the same time be incompetent to think infinit God, or an infinit unknowable? And then it may be asked, by what kind of metamorphism does it come to pass that an infinit number which is made up of units is not divisible? And if it is, how is it infinit? And then again, how does it come to pass that infinit space is full? If it is full, what disposition has been made of its infinitude? But a promis of relief comes from the side of Theism. The incomprehensible God brings relief, for he has in the fullness of time spoken in the terms of revelation, and this is the reason why Theism can tell us so much about the incomprehensible. It might, however, be well to suggest, Is it possible for a revelation of an infinit to come as infinit, only as it comes in the terms of the infinit? And if not, how can a revelation coming in such terms convey any idea to limitation, seeing that the infinit (whatever that is) has no meaning for the finite? But if this infinit God reveals himself in the terms of human limitation, how then has it any more authority than the human? Hence a revelation from the incomprehensible God is impossible. That one incomprehensible might communicate with another incomprehensible, is as likely to be true as false, seeing that we are entirely ignorant as to the meaning of such a term. An infinit God might make himself known to another infinit God, but certainly not to a finite being. And when the Agnostic postulates "the infinit unknowable" he certainly ought to be profoundly amazed if he would simply inquire how it came to pass that "the infinit unknowable" made itself known to limitation, seeing that it is the unknowable. Its revelation must hav been in the terms of the unknowable. Then we ask, how did it transpire that limitation became advised as to the meaning of the terms of the infinit unknowable? Agnosticism to be rational must bring itself within the sphere of the unknown, and not the unknowable, the meaningless, infinit unknowable. When the Agnostic says, I do not know, I cannot affirm or deny, this is all true—but it is not true when he postulates the infinit unknowable, because he affirms what he denies. It is as irrational to say that there is a God as to say there is no God. If it is irrational to say that there is a God, it cannot be irrational to deny an irrational proposition. If, then, it is irrational to say that there is a God, certainly it is not irrational to say that there is no God, surely so when the statement stands as a denial of the proposition that there is a God. Beyond this the question of rationality or irrationality does not arise at all, simply because the object, hypothetically or otherwise, is not an object of thought, and hence neither affirmations or negations are admissible. It is not a question of rationality or irrationality, but a question simply of limitation. To affirm that there is, or is not, an object of thought beyond one's limits, is neither rational nor irrational. It is not in the province of thought at all. Neither affirmation nor negation is possible to thought when they relate to that which is not an object of thought. This is precisely the relation which Agnosticism presents to us. Its object of thought does not admit of either affirmation or negation. Agnosticism does not permit us to entertain any opinion of the unknowable which it postulates, either good, bad, or indifferent. This renders the idea of the object absurd in itself. Objects of thought can only come to consciousness under difference. But if this is not possible, then the postulation of an infinit unknowable is beyond all doubt the essence of all contradiction. To say, The incomprehensible, the infinit unknowable, does not involve the question of rationality or irrationality, but a want of data for either affirmation or negation. That which does not come within the range of human possibilities is neither rational nor irrational, and it admits of no speech, seeing that there are no data for speech. If it is a necessity of thought which compels us to postulate the unknowable, is it not equally a necessity of thought to know how we can make that postulation? When we are compelled to reason under the shadow of the incomprehensible and the unknowable, our reasoning must be worthless. If there is an infinit unknowable, all speculation about it is useless. If there is something in the universe, or out of it, which is impossible to representation in the terms of quality and quantity, it must remain unexpressed. That is, we in our limitation hav no terms in which to express it, hence it is impossible for it to hav any datum in consciousness. Of course we are forced to the implication that if any such thing does exist, without quantity and quality, and hence inexpressible in the terms of limitation, it must be that which is called infinit space and infinit duration. But we cannot concede the truth of this implication, for these terms mean nothing to rational thought. That is, as I view it, we hav no idea of space only in the terms of limitation. Terms not measured by our capacity, or limitation, are necessarily meaningless to us. The distance between here and the sun is a part of space; the only term by which any meaning of it is possible and by which alone we can think and talk of it are the terms of part or parts, with, of necessity, the implication of a whole, as all wholes are made up of parts, and hence limited. It is true that our limitation compels us to think of it in this way, and it is no less true that our limitation compels us to think of it without the possibility of fixing limits to it, but this differs widely from the statement that space is infinit, for this is to place it beyond any form of speech or thought possible to us.

The other supposed implication is that of duration. This, like the term infinit space, has no meaning. That is, it has no meaning in terms which represent anything in consciousness. We only think of time or duration in the terms of part or parts, always in the terms of limitation. Infinit parts or numbers convey no meaning. Numbers are divisible, the same as is space. If this is possible of space or duration, then they only mean limitation to us, as we hav no way to invent a term beyond our limits. We can not think or talk out of ourselvs. To divide an object into equal parts or unequal parts, to these the terms apply. Equal, unequal, more or less, are forms of speech such as come within the limited, such as we are. These supposed somethings which hav no terms of representation, yet are named infinit God, the infinit unknowable, the infinit force, the infinit energy—if they mean anything that is knowable, or unknown, then we can readily fall into line. But when we are informed that this something, or it, is the unknowable, and yet it is, we hav one fact about this unknowable that is positiv—it exists, it is not a nonentity. And in the second place we are informed that this it is the incomprehensible, infinit God—this it is the infinit unknowable, infinit energy, infinit force. It might appropriately be asked, How is it possible to plead pure ignorance in view of so many affirmations? But a very important question arises here, How is it possible for a human being to take in the thought of such an existence, when he is assured that his thoughts are in no way representativ of this something? Whatever the thought is of that something, or the unknowable, it in no way bears any relation that is truthful as to what it is. If our thoughts of this unknowable are in no way truthful as to that unknowable, how was the fact discovered that an opinion, or a thought, agrees, or disagrees, with the object of that thought? It certainly must be necessary to know something about the object of that thought, ignorance of which must necessarily close our lips.

It is evident that we can say, the unknown, the known, and the knowable, but that there is an infinit God, the infinit unknowable, is the hight of contradiction. It affirms in one breath what it denies in another. That Jupiter is inhabited, I know not. If it is, I am not advised as to the nature and character of its inhabitants. But I can conceive of conditions which would settle this matter at once. But if it is maintained that, whether Jupiter is inhabited or not, it is unknowable, that at once forever settles the question, and no attempt would or could ever be made to learn anything about Jupiter. It is unknowable. That is final. Thus we cannot conceive of conditions that would giv us any light upon the question. The ultimatum is contained in the fact that it is unknowable. That fact cuts off all inquiry. We are part of a universe of which we can say that it is known in part and in part unknown, but by no power of speech or thought can it be said that it is unknowable. I cannot with rational consistency say that the universe is unknowable. We can say that it is knowable in the presence of conceivable conditions, but to say that it is unknowable is not in the province of human speech. But if the universe is a phenomenon only and behind it is an infinit God, the unknowable, and if no explanation of phenomena is possible without this noumenon, or infinit God, or unknowable, then we stand committed to an infinit series, whatever that is, and behind this infinit God or unknowable there must be in the nature of this reasoning another infinit God or unknowable—which is self-contradictory. We are a part of this universe, and need not be hoodwinked by an assumption which does violence to our rational nature. This universe is knowable, and our constant increasing knowledge of it is in demonstration of this fact. Time and opportunity are the conditions, and these conditions are constantly lessening the unknown and increasing the known, and this in proportion to the forced retirement of the infinit, or the unknowable, and the supernatural. When they are out of the way our progress will be greatly accelerated. The displacement of these scarecrows of superstition has ever been the measure of human progress. If we are willing to take the universe as it is and study it in the light of our limitation, seeing that no one can think higher than his highest thoughts, we will be relieved from the cruel monster named the unknowable, or incomprehensible.

The learned and the unlearned unite in one thing, and that is in tracing religion to this source, the unknowable. That fact alone is enough for an outraged universe to vacate the throne from whose occupant this unmitigated curse of the centuries comes, religion.

Had I a clear conception of the infinit and of an infinit series I then might be competent to express myself in the terms which are now too much for my limitation. I cannot aspire to the dignity of such a conception, for even if I should hav such a conception I fear it would crush my limitation. I must be content to stand by the side of the old Greek Agnostic and plead ignorance, confessing, on bended knees if need be, that I do not know. Theism, notwithstanding it is logically committed to the infinit incomprehensible, the unknowable, yet practically forces upon itself inevitable destruction in its attempt to practicalize the incomprehensible. It commits suicide. It divides itself in the claim which it compels itself to make—that this incomprehensible is known in part. This implies necessarily discrimination between parts. The part known or comprehended must be seen in its relation to the part or parts not known or comprehended, in order to discriminate. The inspired penman in dividing the incomprehensible was made acquainted with the hind part of the incomprehensible—this, in fact, was a necessity, as inferable from the same inspiration which declares that no one can see the face of the incomprehensible and liv. An expert in anatomy and physiology might determin from any one part seen or known the nature, character, and proportions of the parts unseen or unknown; but the result of such an experiment, if successful, would solve the problem, and the incomprehensible would disappear—as this implies the fitting of part to its allied part, which would consummate the structure, and thus bring it within the line of the limited, ascertained quantity.

We may safely conclude that all prognostications beyond the limited are doomed. All attempts to bridge the gulf from the finite to the something supposed beyond hav ever been written in the terms of futures. Theism cannot affirm an infinit God (whatever that is); Atheism cannot deny. It can deny what Theism affirms, but it cannot deny what Theism cannot affirm. Limitations deny affirmation and negation alike, when reference is made to that which is not limited. A logic which rigorously locks us up within the environments that are limited, if fully recognized would, no doubt, hav a decided beneficial effect. It is easy to say, infinit God, infinit space, eternity, the infinit unknowable, but when any attempt is made to satisfy inquiry as to the meaning of these words limitation must be called in, and then contradictions of the terms are rendered necessary. Let no one imagin that in my pleadings of ignorance I commit in thought or word anyone to my ignorance; when I say impossible to thoughts, not rational, it only means, to me.

We hav suggested that the universe is knowable. I imagin that this suggestion is not utterly void of probability, as it may seem on first thought. At any rate, we are safe in saying that it has vastly greater credibility than the opposit hypothesis, which proclaims it unknowable. It is true that the Agnostic does not claim that the universe is the unknowable, but that the universe is the manifestation of the unknowable. I see no way by which discrimination can be had so as to separate phenomena from their substratum. A relation certainly must exist between the unknowable and the phenomenal universe which is its manifestation. The manifestations of the unknowable must of necessity partake of the nature of the unknowable, whose child it is. And this is no doubt the reason why Mr. Spencer says that "we know nothing in its ultimate essence." So I would be allowed to say that Agnosticism postulates the unknowability of the univer-e. That the universe is knowable, is the reasonable, rational hypothesis. When we say that the universe is knowable we state that which no one can dispute; while in the statement that the universe is unknowable we only state that which no one knows, and if the statement is true the postulation is false—for to know that the universe is unknowable is to know something about it, which is a contradiction.

How has it ever been discovered that there is the unknowable, that this is the unknowable universe, before discrimination has taken place? Both the known and the unknowable must be known, as the basis of discrimination, without which how are discriminativ lines to be drawn between the known and the unknowable? Discrimination will show on which side of the line these objects of thought are classed. These objects of thought are designated thus. On this side of the line is the knowable, on the other side the unknowable. And thus the character of each is settled, settled by an act of discrimination. But how could this act be performed unless both were known? To affirm the known, in distinction from the unknowable, involves a necessary knowledge of them both. Then what becomes of the infinit unknowable? We say that the universe is knowable, through the knowledge which has been attained of the universe and the constant increase of that knowledge. We add to these facts that we can think possible conditions which render the universe knowable. Such knowledge with conceivable conditions renders a knowledge of the universe conceivable. In dealing with the universe we hav as objects of thought matter, motion, and their relations. We cannot think of matter and motion without their relations. Matter is inconceivable without space and time relations. We cannot think of the beginning of matter, motion, or time relations. Hence we cannot conceive beginning or end to space, time, or duration. All of these things which we cannot conceive only show our limitations, under the environments in which we are compelled to do our thinking. But be it remembered, there is no analogy between these statements of ours, as to these objects of thought, and the statement which places them under the protection of the unknowable. To say that matter never had a beginning, and will never hav an end, differs widely from the saying that I cannot conceive the beginning of matter, nor can I conceive its end. That there is an eternity past and an eternity to come, differs also widely from the saying I cannot conceive the beginning of time nor can I conceive its end. To say that there is an infinit unknowable, is quite unlike the saying that I do not know. Science has no ultimatum. The theory which I oppose is final. It is infallible. It has an ultimatum in the person of the infinit unknowable.

At the same time, we are compelled to the conclusion that the universe to which we belong, and of which we are a part, is, as we hav said, knowable. If we are a part of it, then is it possible for all of the parts to be known, in the presence of suitable environments. That such environments will come I do not know. But if the universe is made up of parts, then by a logical necessity the infinit unknowable is excluded. Such an entity, or nonentity, can hav no place in an universe made up of increments, for that would be to establish a relation between the infinit unknowable and limitations, which is fatal.

We are gradually conquering the infinit unknowable. Time and opportunity are the needed factors in securing the mission of man on this globe. That time and opportunity will be forthcoming, I cannot say. But whether they are, or not, in no way can it become legitimate for creatures, limited as we are, to affirm the infinit unknowable or deny it. In either case we hazard mental suicide. We are informed by an Agnostic, somewhat prominent, to the following effect. He says: "The known, including the unknown, and the unknowable, constitute together our sole environment. Such a consciousness, such an acknowledgment of the unknowable, is upon the face of it part of the scheme and plan of life." This is remarkable indeed, if it is true. "The unknowable is a part of the scheme and plan of life." Hence the unknowable is immediately brought directly into the scheme and plan of life—not quite so formidable as we hav been led to suppose and believe. This infinit unknowable is right here in the scheme and plan of life. I do not see, according to this, why the Agnostic of this stripe is not as well provided for as is the Christian. His God enters into the scheme and plan of life. The Agnostic's does the same. And hence the logical implication is, that intercession with the unknowable may modify or change the plan of life. But the question might arise, how does it happen that this author has found out the fact that the unknowable is in the "scheme and plan of life?" This seems flippant, to talk in this familiar way with the infinit unknowable—as presumptuous as are the Christians. How does the author know that the infinit unknowable sustains any such relation as he suggests? If he knows nothing about the unknowable how is it possible for him to imagin the existence of a relation between the unknowable and human beings? This author does not leave us here. He says: "Of the hidden meaning of the unknowable we know nothing." The implication is, that we do know something of the unhidden meaning of the unknowable. So the unknowable, like the God of Moses, is divided—a part is hidden and another part is unhidden. But how are we to know which is which unless we hav a chance to compare them? This writer emphasizes the above quotation. He says: "We shall only act falsely if we deny its hidden meaning." That is, if we deny the hidden meaning of the unknowable. This author must know what the hidden meaning of the unknowable is. If he does not, how has he become so well posted about it? It may be that he is the Moses of this new God and has had a revelation from him, and this accounts for his wonderful unknowable illumination. The following sounds a little popish, a slumbering hint of thumbscrew: "We shall act falsely if we deny this hidden meaning." If we do not think as this author does we are heretics, we are "false." If this is the charity of Agnosticism, if between Christianity and Agnosticism our choice lies, we had better take to the woods. But this is not the whole of our Agnostic's infallible dictum. He says: "Only by an outrage of our highest and deepest feelings can such a denial be uttered." This certainly givs unbelievers on the Agnostic anxious seat no better chance than Theism grants to unbelief. It is very modest in this author to charge those who do not take kindly to his dictum with outrage and falsehood. But we do not see why we should expect any different treatment from a priest of Agnosticism than we would from a priest of the Christian religion, seeing that they both are in the same boat. They both hav the unknowable, the incomprehensible.

Doubtless we are expecting too much of that kind of Agnosticism which postulates the infinit unknowable when we look for toleration, for in the last analysis it cannot giv it. It is compelled to make everything bend to the unknowable. There are wide differences represented between Theism and Agnosticism only by the force of illegitimate reasoning. In all that is fundamental, logically determined, they are alike. It is true that Theism offers solace to its devotees which Agnosticism cannot, but this difference is only reached by false reasoning. This fact of solace to its devotees is only on account of the fact that the unknowable of Theism has done what the unknowable of Agnosticism has not done—made a revelation in a book which reveals its unknowableness in part. This ought to furnish Agnostics with a hint to go and do likewise. This it would do if it was as considerate of the immaterialistic and spiritualistic Agnostic as Theism is of its devotees. If it would come out with a flaming revelation from the unknowable it could gain devotees at the Christian shrine. But according to our author, we are not left in the dark. The following, though quoted by the author from one of his critics, his comment thereon, legitimates our hope that the author does not leave us in the dark: "A wholly unknowable object of Agnostic contemplation will never, we are sure, help to make men, women, and children good." This is what our author quotes. Upon which he says: "It is scarcely logical, we think, to libel that which is unknowable as inoperativ for good." The implication is, that the unknowable is operativ for good. If it is a libel upon the unknowable, or if it is not, how does this author know? I cannot imagin how the author gets his information, unless he gets it as did Moses. How can he say, or not say, what is a libel upon the capacity of the unknowable unless he has been advised as to the unknowable's capacity? And if he has been advised then the unknowableness of the unknowable has been compromised? This author gives us another sentence which throws light upon this unthinkable and unknowable subject. He says: "Thus it is that modern thinking men, accustomed to half truth alone, cannot readily comprehend a consistent and connected whole, even when offered them in all honesty." This sounds well on paper, coming from an Agnostic pope. We might say to this tolerant author that it is not a question of honesty or dishonesty, but a question of truth, with modern thinking men. You giv those modern thinking men the truth and you will find them willing to take it. But these men are unwilling to swear by the infinit unknowable, seeing that they know as much, and as little, about the infinit unknowable as the biggest apostle of this unknowable God. These modern thinking men are not able to see how a certain few hav been able to discover the inscrutable, the unthinkable, the undiscoverable, the unknowable, and talk about them so fluently, and then say that "these modern thinking men cannot readily comprehend a consistent and connected whole."

But the following from our author is worthy of a place in historical literature: "Others go farther, and contend that, beyond our knowledge and limit of possible knowledge, nothing is. . . . It is well to be frank, but not too frank; so other thinkers, more cautious, hav effectually limited this latter statement by adding to it with parenthesis a very feminin postcript, and saying that in the above circumstances nothing is (to us). In reality this saving clause (to us) has a very considerable meaning, one which is exclusiv as well as inclusiv. Although everything within the circle of our present or possible knowledge is in a sense (to us), it is that which is in itself and yet is not (to us) which contains the riddle. . . . It is that which is in itself and yet is not (to us)." Who made the discovery? How, when, and in what place was it made? "That which is in itself and not to us." How did it get out of itself so that our author found it? And if he found it then it must be to him (to us). This is an Agnostic riddle. It is not lawful to say that a statement is not true to me, but it is quite Agnostic to say it is that which is in itself and yet is not to me that is true. It is quite lawful to say, the infinit unknowable, and then talk flippantly about him, she, or it. This is logical. But it is a very feminin postcript to say that to us it is not true. To postulate an unknowable is unreasonable to me (feminin postscript), because it conveys no idea, and if it should suggest one, I am assured that the idea, whatever it might be, would be false. We can, with the utmost confidence in the light of present researches, postulate a knowable universe. This is in harmony with all modern achievements, fortified by all scientific discoveries.

The ceaseless struggle which is now going on, in reading the lessons of the universe which are being constantly presented to all modern investigators, is full of hope. And then when we remember the encouragements which come as the result of these readings and achievements, we are still fortified in the hope that the Agnostic riddle will be solved. Every day research comes burdened with knowledge which enriches the human mind and human history. All tends to emphasize the important fact that knowledge is increasing. The universe is giving up its secrets to the intelligent being whom it has evolved, and thus it will continue to do as long as environments are suitable for man's growth and improvement. Giv him time and opportunity and he is destined to read the problems and enigmas of the universe. That he will hav the time and opportunity to accomplish these ends, is not a hope which admits of indulgence; it is more than the wildest optimist could hope for. But it is not because the universe is unknowable, or that there is an infinit unknowable behind it or within it, but simply because time and opportunity are not likely to lend their aid.

And yet the infinit unknowable is a myth. Why lumber up human speech with such absurd inventions? Why not allow us to use words which are the representations of ideas? When Theism formulated its incomprehensible, its infinit God, it committed treason against truth and human nature—as well as all of its boasted revelation in sacred books, as in incarnate gods it sought recognition at the expense of what it had formulated under the name incomprehensible. Theism has a plan, a scheme, notwithstanding its treason. It should hav left its incomprehensible where Agnosticism has left its unknowable. But now it stands charged and convicted with cruel divine despotism, and it has stood with drawn sword across every road leading to man's chosen eden.

It has made an intellectual pauper of him through the ages. In filth and degradation, in prisons and in dungeons, in dens of wild beasts and at the stake, has he been compelled, with the curse of the gods upon him, to entail his misery upon innocent posterity. So it may be said, that the incomprehensible has forced the race to bear all of this cruelty and torture on bended knee, and thus to weep the dreadful centuries away. And now, as soon as the dawn of day has been ushered in, as the result of human research, which has a promis of human emancipation from the incomprehensible, from the supernatural—no sooner has this blessed day dawned upon human hope than a new god comes to light, not in revelations written on stone by the fingers of God, but as the infinit unknowable. It is true that this infinit unknowable god does not propose to slaughter those who do not worship him, in this unlike the old Gods. And unlike them in another respect, he has no promis to offer. He tells not of a promised redeemer—not of a savior to save the world. He offers no hundredfold in this life, nor does he say, "In my father's house are many mansions." He does not say, "Call upon me in the day of trouble and I will answer thee." No, no! he only says, the inscrutable, the unknowable. Perhaps this new god is not inclined to make promises, as other gods hav done before him. No, this new god only speaks in the terms of the unknowable: "Tell it to your children and your children's children forever, that I am that I am, the infinit unknowable."

Of what use this new god is to the race, is not mentioned. No one seems to be well advised as to what he will do. He makes but one revelation, and that is the unknowable. Those who believe in him claim that they are Agnostic. I am of the opinion that the great majority of the Agnostics worship not at the shrine of the unknowable. They say, not, "the unknowable," but they say, "I do not know." The unknowable means nothing to them. They frankly say, "I do not know." They will stand by that, and cherish the hope that the time is not in the remote future when the rational and thoughtful class of modern thinkers will discard entirely their new god called the unknowable and abide in the daylight of the clearly expressed thought. I do not know.

As I hav said, I am ready to recognize the truth of Agnosticism when it stands for the unknown, but not for the unknowable. When it is made to do that kind of duty, it must of necessity be written in the terms of contradiction. It professedly rests upon a negation. It starts with a negation. It starts with a negativ, and then it turns directly around and says affirmativly, there is an infinit unknowable. It never stops to inform inquiry how the unknowable was discovered. It is as positiv as theism and pleads the same kind of ignorance. Only the unknowable of theism comes into human life and knowledge through a revelation on the part of the infinit incomprehensible god. It is the Agnostic's infinit unknowable, with the addition of revelation, without which the object of theistic belief is the veritable unknowable. But when Agnosticism is allowed to remain on the pleadings of ignorance, it stands for all that the intellectual, scientific, and social nature of man demands.

It is not a very difficult matter to understand the nature of the pleadings and the philosophy which introduced into Agnosticism the infinit unknowable. It is assumed by Mr. Spencer and others that the nature of man necessarily implies religion. The word religion is considered essential in the life of the race. There I think the fundamental difficulty lies. The religious nature of man, so called, is fundamental in the life of the race—so long as this false claim is allowed a front seat an infinit unknowable becomes a necessity as a background of religion. Herein lies the secret of the conflict.

And this must continue, as of old, at the expense of the moral life of the race. Our religion, as any student of history well knows, has ever been the great enemy of human achievement and progress in every direction. Morality has been largely repressed by this conflict. Why, in the light of its history, it should be at this age allowed to thrust its unsavory face into modern civilization, is only understood by skipping over an essential part in its evolution. In this age, the drift of thought among those most competent to render an opinion upon the origin of religion, points to a belief in a ghost life after death, or a belief in the survival of the so-called soul of the dead. Mr. Spencer and many other prominent thinkers hav shown how this belief came. No doubt the genesis of this belief came as these eminent men hav stated. But the wonder is that, while these men see so clearly how this belief was evolved in the process of evolution, they hav not sought out the essential part overlooked in this evolution. While there is no doubt as to the truth which evolved this belief, it is no less true that it was not founded in fact. These men are ready to admit that this was a necessity on the part of primitiv man, in his ignorance, to attempt to furnish an explanation of phenomena, which suggested the theory which gave religion an existence. If a false explanation of phenomena (and in fact, any other was impossible) which was embraced by primitiv man introduced religion into the world, what right has it to a continued existence? What right has it to a venerable existence, seeing that it is the child of falsehood? Why discard one, and cherish the other as a fundamental truth? When in the progress of the race science was gained and the true interpretation of phenomena was rendered by science, why hold on to that interpretation which was given in the infancy of the race, when it is impossible that it should be otherwise than false? Why take its interpretation of religion? If modern science can demonstrate that the primitiv reading of man and his destiny was correct, then modern science can go on and do battle for the same—do battle for religion as a necessity in man's social make-up. I cannot well imagin anything more absurd than that seeming felt need for some kind of religion. Though its origin is well known, known to be the outcome of a false reading of the phenomena which surrounded primitiv man, then to hav it invested with a sacredness is only to be seen as a necessary outcome of the infinit unknowable. It skipped the gulf into which it should hav fallen with a flat earth, and a thousand other interpretations of primitiv man. If religion came as the result of a false reading of nature, why in the name of decency should it be allowed dominion when a correct reading under the light of science has been made? The unknowable is responsible for the continuance of this tendency. If we are in need of a term to express the social feelings and the relations of human beings, do not let us force ourselvs by an assumed poverty of words to continue the use of a word which stands for all of the villainies of the centuries, a word which pilots the murderer from the scaffold through the dark valley of death to Abraham's bosom and sends Bruno and millions of other worthies to the stake and an endless hell in another life. Why wrap the bloody skirts of religion around the social life of civilized men, women, and children? Why try by modern science to wash off stains from its bloody fingers? Why defile the lips and life of innocent babyhood by learning it to lisp this foul word? Does it make this word, which is the synonym of all deformity and depravity—does it make this word, which in the light of its history should never pass the lips of decency, any more fit for duty by placing humanity after it? All that such association suggests is the defilement and degradation of that humanity. Religion admits of no redemption. Utter extinction, with a proclamation which prohibits its resurrection, is its only desert. We hav words which are competent to do service in all of the varying conditions of social life without the use of that word, which I would be glad never to speak again or hear pronounced. There are no relations conceivable among human beings which demand the use of ideas which cannot be fully stated without the use of this convict, criminal word which inspires the bloody deeds of Christianity. Fourteenth Annual Congress.

The Fourteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union has been appointed by the board of directors to meet at Portsmouth, O., on Friday evening, October 31, 1890, and to continue its sessions on the Saturday and Sunday following.

The meetings will be held in the Grand Opera House, corner of Sixth and Court streets, and the orchestra of the establishment has been engaged for the occasion. Due notice will be given of the proposed reduction in railroad, steamboat, and hotel fares.

Portsmouth is situated on the Ohio river, one hundred miles east of Cincinnati, and one hundred miles south of Columbus, and has extensiv and convenient railway connections with the whole country. It is a port of foreign entry, and is distinguished for its numerous and magnificent manufactories. It has a population exceeding fifteen thousand, has twenty churches, the Ohio Military Academy, and a splendid system of graded schools. The Ohio valley fair is held there annually; and several English and German papers, daily and weekly, are published in the city.

The members and friends of the American Secular Union are sure of a hearty welcome, not only from our enterprising local auxiliary, but also from the citizens at large.

The object of the American Secular Union, as is well known, is to secure the total separation of church and state in fact and in form, to the end that equal rights in religion, genuin morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood be established, protected, and perpetuated. While we unite on what is commonly known as the Nine Demands of Secularism, we propose to emphasize the following at the coming Congress:

1. The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.

2. The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.

3. The repeal and prevention of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons.

4. The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character.

The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both religion and politics, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but heartily welcomes all persons, of whatever faith, to its membership, on the basis of "no union of church and state." The word "secular" is here used in the broadest sense, as applied to the state, and not to any system of religion or philosophy.

To discuss these questions in an orderly and friendly manner, and to devise ways and means to promote these objects, let us come together at this Congress as Freethinkers, Spiritualists, Unitarians, Universalists, Free Religionists, Quakers, progressiv Jews, and liberal Christians, and, laying aside our peculiar views on religious questions, unite as American citizens on the one broad platform of no union of church and state, and the complete administration of our secular government on purely secular principles.

The National Reform Association, having for its object the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the state by constitutional enactment; the American Sabbath Union, working for the enforcement, by legislation, of the Jewish and puritanic Sabbath on our free citizens; the Women's Christian Temperance Union, indorsing the platform and policy of both these organizations; the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, insisting through their ecclesiastical bodies upon the complete exemption of church property from just taxation, as well as the appropriation of public money for religious schools and other sectarian institutions; all these, and many others which might be mentioned, are imperiling our constitutional liberties. Every true Liberal and patriot, whether man or woman, should feel called upon to aid in organizing an effectiv opposition to these nefarious schemes.

Due notice will be given of the selection of eminent speakers from all portions of the United States and Canada, and a free platform will be given to all persons who may hav a word to say for pure state secularization. All, without exception, are welcome to this Congress in the wide-awake little city in the valley of the beautiful Ohio.

How Shall We Do?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The lecturers, to whom the Secular Union made its appeal, might utilize their traveling for the benefit of the Union, for the benefit of all Liberal journals, and for their own benefit, not least because last mentioned. Professions of unselfish devotion to a cause are cheap and easily made. There may be cases where such devotion exists, and which leaves the individual self entirely out of the question, but they are extremely rare. Profuse professions of such loyalty will be accepted with suspicion. Genuin unselfishness does not blow its own trumpet.

There is no more reason, in this age of the world, why a lecturer should remain on the ragged edge of poverty than why a lawyer should. No one should expect a lecturer to so love the cause he champions that he will cheerfully forego all of the luxuries and some of the necessaries of life. If the members of the Liberal army in private life did nothing to accumulate wealth, there would be more show of reason in demanding that lecturers hold themselvs in readiness to be devoured daily for the sake of the cause. The mass of Liberals do not expect any such thing. There is nothing in Liberalism requiring anybody to cultivate poverty. There should be cooperation all round. The officers of the Secular Union employ no such cant as that lecturers should offer themselvs as living sacrifices on the altar of Liberalism. On the contrary, they address them in a common-sense, straightforward, business fashion, for which they deserve our esteem. They are not like the hypocritical church which commends poverty and strives to obtain millions of wealth upon which it refuses to pay a cent of taxes. No, the officers of the Union address us as workers in the field, advocates of the best principles, the most common-sense teachings, the world ever heard. The officers of the Secular Union, as business people, in business language, want cooperation that will be "a gain to the cause and to you individually;" "a regular series of appointments;" "more dollars in his pocket at the end of the year;" "a more systematic advertising of the cause;" arousing the people to a "sense of their wrongs;" and a solid organization of Liberals.

All this means work, and a great deal of it; but we should not be dismayed at this, for it is exactly what some of us hav been used to for the past twenty-five years and more. If the activ Liberals of the country will coöperate, if even fifty thousand of them will do something in this line, we can hav this solid organization. To begin with:

1. Why cannot each Liberal send the officers of the Union $1, not next year, but now, this week?

2 Why should not all earnest Liberals coöperate immediately? Why delay? Why read this and admit its truth, and then do nothing?

3. Why should not every lecturer take sample copies of all our publications, and go from house to house in every town visited? Are we too proud to do this? We should not be. It is honorable work for humanity, and no one shovld be above his work.

4. Why should not a part of the fund subscribed be for these sample copies? We do not use the powerful printing-press a thousandth part as much as we should.

5. Why should not lecturers procure lists of names of all persons, including Christians, who attend Liberal lectures, to which names all our publishers can mail sample copies from time to time?

6. As the officers of the Union truly remark, "The tendency of the time is toward consolidation and coöperation where work of any magnitude is to be undertaken." Why, then, not coöperate? Why should not every publisher send a lecturer, in any given part of the country, printed lists of subscribers in that state? In return, the lecturers to send many times larger lists of possible subscribers. Let the old bad spirit of competition go. I say to every Liberal publisher, Do not be afraid that it will injure your business in the least to furnish well-tried lecturers, who will coöperate with the American Secular Union, lists of your subscribers in states where they may be lecturing. "This would mean more dollars," Liberal publisher, in your "pocket at the end of the year." It is worth a trial. Liberal lectures arouse a community as nothing else can. Liberal journals are absolutely essential to hold the interest. I hav observed for several years that those Liberals who stop taking Freethought papers grow cold in the cause, and many of them drift into the church. There is no more practical work than distributing our Liberal publications. There ought to be a fund for this purpose sustained by the Liberals of the United States.

7. Let us take hold with renewed activity and organize a Secular society in every town where even two or three members can be obtained. Do not wait to organize large societies. Be content with small beginnings where there is any prospect of growth. Some of the weakest Liberal societies I ever organized were large ones, seventy-five members and upward; some of the best were less than ten.

Now, how many working Liberals are there in this country. Let us hav a new count. Do not count vapids, nothingarians, man-afraid-of-his-wife, or woman-afraid of-her-neighbor. Let us get a fresh start, with Liberals who hav conviction and backbone. W. F. JAMIESON.

Witchcraft.

It would seem to many thinkers a great stretch of imagination to affirm what was denounced by old Moses in Ex. xxii, 18, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv," and our present mediumship in all its strange forms, to be identical; but so it seems apparent to the writer.

Mesmer, when in Paris lecturing and giving exhibitions on his curious peculiarity, was unmercifully denounced by Dr. Franklin and his savans as a shameless impostor and fraud. But let us not be too severe with the doctor. He did the best he knew.

No doubt what has been called sorcery, soothsaying, necromancy, and the Delphic oracles of pagan nations of the past and present had a truthful basis. Even mesmerism was long believed to, and does yet, account for many strange mental eccentricities of mankind; but even mesmerism was becoming too vulgar and common for refined thinkers; but as our scientists hav now dignified it with the name of "hypnotism" it has become a subject worth consideration.

But let thinkers giv themselvs no uneasiness. Mediumship in all its various phases is getting better understood in spite of all the frauds and tricks practiced by pretended or fraudulent mediums.

To some minds the established knowledge that we still continue to exist after death is all in all satisfactory, while they take little heed of the moral preparation of conduct necessary to make that future less remorseful and happy. To such minds it is "like seed sown on stony ground."

Without attempting to explain in what way the following communication was given to the writer, which, in fact, was very simple, I transcribe the following: "My son, when you leave this earth, we know you will surely come to us, and therefore are more interested in your moral welfare than the unavoidable trials incident to earth life." The Liberal Association of Texas.

From the Independent Pulpit.

Pursuant to a call, a meeting of Liberals was held in Waco, Texas, July 15 and 16, 1890

At 9 o'clock A.M. of the first day, J. D. Shaw, of Waco, called the delegates to order and stated the object of the meeting. T. V. Munson, of Denison, was then elected president, and J. L. Jackson, of Weatherford, secretary. An opportunity was next given for the delegates to hand in their names, and forty-seven were found to be present.

The question of organization being proposed, a general expression of opinion was called for, and quite a number responded, in brief but interesting speeches, showing most conclusivly that the prevailing sentiment was in favor of immediate organization, and a committee of seven was appointed to report on the subject at the next session.

At 4:30 P.M., fourteen new delegates handed in their names, and the committee appointed in the forenoon made a partial report, favoring organization, proposing a name, and submitting certain objects to be attained.

After considerable discussion, the report was adopted and the committee reinstructed to complete its work by including a full and complete plan of organization.

At 8:30 P.M., the question, "Is Morality Progressiv?" was made the subject for general discussion, and a number of speeches were made, from which it became manifest that the ethical spirit was the prevailing one, and that the moral elevation of the people was the chief object in view.

At 9 A.M. of the second day, twelve new delegates handed in their names, and the committee to which had been referred the plan of organization reported that, for want of time, it had not been able to perfect a full report, and requested that a general discussion of the subject be had by the meeting. The request was agreed to, and the committee discharged.

After a full and free discussion, involving several proposed plans, the following was adopted by a unanimous vote:

Resolved, I. That we, Liberals of Texas, in convention assembled, do hereby organize ourselvs into a society, to be known as the Liberal Association of Texas.

Resolved, II. That the objects of this Association shall be as follows:

1. To encourage the study of man in all his relations.
2. To seek to realize the truth in life.
3. To aid in those movements that tend most to the improvement of the individual and of society, and to the unity and freedom of mankind.
4. To facilitate the association of those who hav at heart and hold dear that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being.
5. To inaugurate a system of positiv, tolerant thought, ethical culture, and practical benevolence, in which all liberal-minded people can unite and work for the moral elevation, intellectual improvement, social well-being, and consequent happiness of the human race.

Resolved, III. That we welcome into this Association all persons who indorse these objects, regardless of their speculativ opinions on religion, philosophy, or politics.

Resolved, IV. That the officers of this Association shall be a president, a secretary, and a treasurer, and these officers shall constitute an executiv committee with full power to formulate methods to carry out the purpose for which we are organized.

Resolved, V. That the officers of this Association shall hold their offices until their successors are chosen, which shall be at the regular annual meetings.

Resolved, VI. That an annual fund, to defray the expenses of this organization, shall be raised by voluntary contributions, and that said fund shall be known as the extension fund, and it shall be expended by the executiv committee in any manner they may deem proper.

After the adoption of these resolutions, which constitute the governing principles of the Association, the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: J. D. Shaw, of Waco, president; J. L. Jackson, of Weatherford, secretary; T. V. Munson, of Denison, treasurer.

The afternoon session was principally devoted to a discussion of plans and methods for strengthening the movement, morally, socially, and financially. The condition of the Independent Pulpit was inquired into, and the status of our publishing business fully explained. The following motion was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the executiv committee be authorized and instructed to devote the funds of the Association, so far as is available, to strengthening our base in Waco.

After the adoption of the above resolution, the subscriptions to the extension fund were increased to $300.

The night session was devoted to speeches by several of the delegates, and there being no further business to transact, the Association adjourned to such a time next year as may be designated by the executiv committee.

Thus ended our first meeting, which was participated in by seventy-three delegates from twenty-nine different counties. The meeting was harmonious throughout, and every delegate seemed to be seriously impressed with the importance of the work in hand. It now remains for the Liberals to unite in pushing forward this humble beginning to a grand and glorious success.

Let everyone who can freely indorse the objects of the Association become a member by sending his or her name, with that of the post office and county, to the secretary, J. L. Jackson, Weatherford, Texas. And while sending up your own name, ask your Liberal friends and acquaintances to do the same.

CATHOLICS are now forbidden in France to walk in procession on Corpus Christi. L'Univers says they may blame themselvs for it. It goes on to say, "We are Catholics, and the vast majority of the French people are Catholics. Our God claims to show his universal sovereignty in the streets once a year. It is his right, and our right. We ask nobody to join in our peaceful procession, neither the Jew who crucified him, nor the Atheist who denies him. We respect their liberty, but we want them also to respect ours."

Sumner's Last Wish.

From the Kansas City Times.

Charles Sumner had an intense horror of clerical ministrations at dying bedsides, and made no secret of his feelings in this particular. He believed it to be the very refinement of cruelty to add to the death agony by picturing to the dying man the torments of a hell in store for sinners unless they confessed and repented. As an illustration of this the following story was told your correspondent by a gentleman who was present when the incident occurred:

"One of Mr. Sumner's most intimate friends and confidants was Congressman Hooper of Massachusetts, lately deceased, and who was always welcome at Mr. Sumner's house. One day at dinner the conversation turned on the subject of clerical ministrations to the dying, and Mr. Sumner said: 'Hooper, I want to exact a solemn promis from you. Promis me on your word of honor that if you survive me you will protect my dying bedside from the presence of pious intruders. Don't let them come near me.' The promis was given, and Mr. Sumner made a similar promis to Mr. Hooper. Some months after Mr. Sumner was taken seriously ill with angina pectoris, and lay at the point of death. His friend, Mr. Hooper, remained with him, and even when writhing with agony he reminded Hooper of his promis.

"Finally it became evident that he could not long survive, and the sad intelligence was communicated to the sergeant-at-arms of the Senate, who at once advised the chaplain, the Rev. Dr. Sunderland, and the latter repaired to Mr. Sumner's house to administer spiritual comfort to the dying man. He was met at the door by Mr. Hooper, who, mindful of his promis, invited Dr. Sunderland into the parlor and explained the situation. 'It is no disrespect to you, Dr. Sunderland,' said Mr. Hooper, 'but this is Mr. Sumner's wish, and I cannot permit you to see him. There is only one office you can perform now. Let us pray that, in the mercy of providence, our friend may die free from pain or suffering.'

"And so Dr. Sunderland and the household united in prayer, while Charles Sumner, in the upper bedchamber, breathed his last, as he had wished, 'free from the presence of pious intruders.'"

A Nice Book of Religious Pictures.

From the Ironclad Age.

The Truth Seeker Company has just issued a book of nice religious pictures, accompanied with suitable commentaries. The pictures are by Heston, and consist of illustrations that hav been running through THE TRUTH SEEKER for a long time back. They are now in convenient shape for pulpits and religious center-tables. As a companion volume for the holy Bible this collection is invaluable. The book should hav a large sale amongst clergymen and church congregations. The price is $2, with twenty-five cents additional for postage or express charges if ordered from this office. It is likely that Freethinkers will be the chief buyers, as it seems almost impossible to convince religious people that Infidel efforts to help them over the rough places in their theology are sincere.

Two Stories—Each With a Moral for Christian Evidence Societies.

From the Boston Post.

The Swiss government has officially proclaimed its unbelief in the tradition that Wilhelm Tell shot the apple from his son's head, and has ordered all books which contain any reference to the episode from the schools. Is it not at Altorf that two statues hav been set up, one of Tell and the other of his son, and is it not recorded upon their pedestals that they stand upon the exact positions occupied by Tell, Sr., and Tell, Jr., when the shooting was done? If there were none, how came those statues there? Every right-minded person will see that the Swiss government is clearly in error.

[From Colonel Ingersoll's Reply to Judge Black.

A little while ago, in the city of Chicago, a gentleman addressed a number of Sunday-school children. In his address he stated that some people were wicked enough to deny the story of the deluge; that he was a traveler; that he had been to the top of Mount Ararat, and had brought with him a stone from that sacred locality. The children were then invited to form in procession and walk by the pulpit, for the purpose of seeing the wonderful stone. After they had looked at it, the lecturer said: "Now, children, if you ever hear anybody deny the story of the deluge, or say that the ark did not rest on Mount Ararat, you can tell them that you know better, because you hav seen with your own eyes a stone from that very mountain."

What Is Religion?

In February last I helped to organize a literary society at Beech Creek Baptist church. The constitution of the society proscribed the Bible and religion as subjects of discussion. I thought as we were prohibited by the constitution from discussing religion, we ought to find out what religion is. So I instituted an inquiry and collected as many definitions of religion as I could find, and prepared myself to lecture the society on "What is Religion?" but the president of the society ruled out my lecture. He decided that a lecture on that subject was under the ban of the constitution. So the lecture was not delivered.

I hav recently received sample copies of two papers published in Chicago, viz., the Open Court and the Religio-Philosophical Journal. Both of these papers declare it to be their purpose to harmonize religion with science, and ask for aid in the way of subscriptions from those in sympathy with their purposes. Now, before I can determin whether I am in sympathy with their purpose or not, I must find what religion is, what it is that they want to harmonize with science.

COLLECTED DEFINITIONS OF RELIGION.

1. Religion, the recognition of God as an object of worship, love, and obedience; any system of faith and worship; piety, sanctity.—Webster's Practical Dictionary.

2. Pure religion and undefiled before God and the father, is this: To visit the fatherless and widows in their afflictions, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.—The general Epistle of James i, 27.

3. Religion is man's groping after God.—Rev. Heber Newton.

4. Think constantly, O son, how thou mayest please
Thy father, mother, teacher—these obey.
By deep devotion seek thy debt to pay.
This is thy highest duty, and religion.
—Manu, six hundred years before the Christian era.

5. Let love be your religion.—The Liberal Hymn Book.

6. Humanity is the only religion.—Col. R. G. Ingersoll.

7. The world is my country, and to do good my religion.—Thomas Paine.

Henry Ward Beecher held that religion is right action, and said: "The purpose of religion is not to insure a man against fire, but to create an insurable interest in him."

Some say that religion is thought; others say that it is feeling.

The Methodists say you must get religion. The Campbellites and Catholics say you must do religion.

Prof. Thomas H. Huxley, in "The Order of Creation," quotes this passage from Micha: "And what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" and remarks, "If any so-called religion takes away from this great saying of Micha, I think it wantonly mutilates, while if it adds thereto I think it obscures the perfect ideal of religion. What we are pleased to call religion nowadays, is, for the most part, Hellenized Judaism; and not unfrequently the Hellenic element carries with it a mighty remnant of old-world paganism, and a great infusion of the worst and weakest parts of Greek scientific speculation; while fragments of Persian and Babylonian, or rather Acadian mythology burden the Judaic contribution to the common stock. The antagonism of science is not to religion, but to the heathen survivals and bad philosophy, under which religion herself is often well-nigh crushed. And for my part, I trust that this antagonism will never cease; but that to the end of time true science will continue to fulfill one of her most beneficent functions, that of relieving men from the burden of false science which is imposed upon them in the name of religion."

The Rev. T. W. Smith, an American missionary in the island of Tahiti, says in his article published in THE TRUTH SEEKER some time ago: "I should be ashamed to concede that what has been claimed as Christianity by the church of Rome and others is the Christianity of the New Testament. I should be forced into the rankest Infidelity if I was compelled to believe and indorse the cruel, bigoted, blood-thirsty, and devilish system of religion that exhibited itself in the Inquisition, on Bartholomew's eve, and also in England and Massachusetts, and elsewhere, where men and women hav been burnt, strangled, shot, imprisoned, whipped, and exiled for the exercise of religious or secular views differing from the church holding the reins of government at the time."

Now I will ask, is not this the religion which we citizens of these United States of America under the boasted civilization and enlightenment of the nineteenth century are being persecuted and ostracised for not accepting? And is it not the same religion which the American Reform Association is trying to hav recognized by our national government and adopted as the national religion to be supported by general taxation and protected by the secular arm of the government?

Can this be the religion which these papers are trying to harmonize with science? Now is it not an astonishing fact that such men as Thomas Paine, Ingersoll, and Huxley, whose ideas of religion are nearest in accord with the Bible, are called Infidels by the people who hold the Bible to be the inspired word of God?

If religion is good deeds, right action, as held by St. James, Micha, Huxley, Paine, Ingersoll, Beecher, and Manu, it is not in conflict with science, and criticism cannot hurt it; discussion will only strengthen it and make it shine the brighter; but Christian theology which is nowadays called religion is a system of doctrins which are false, irrational, and supernatural, which cannot possibly be harmonized with science, which is based upon reason, experience, and observation. As H. W. Beecher said, the forest of theology will hav to be cut down and destroyed so that we can plant Liberalism and the religion of humanity. So I say to all lovers of liberty and friends of humanity, lay the ax to the root of that infamous tree of theology. Exterminate that infamous system of religion which has been called Christianity by the church of Rome and her Protestant offspring, and establish the religion of good deeds, the religion of humanity.

Los Angeles Assembly of Progress.

Mr. J. M. Voss, the grand prefect, is evidently sincere and honest, but in his letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 16th fails to afford the needed evidence of the perfection of the Grand Assembly of Progress scheme, and seems to mistake my motivs. I wrote: "I hav long been intensely anxious that the Liberals should hav a mutual aid society for both sexes, that would make sure provision for dependent loved ones, in which no prayers or mummeries, religious or otherwise, would be allowed; founded and conducted on strictly business principles; affording insurance at actual cost, and paying fair salaries for needed work done, but no sinecures, fat jobs, or division of spoils among managers." I concluded with the declaration, "I do not doubt the good intent of the Los Angeles Assembly of Progress, but their scheme is not practical or reliable. I do hope, however, that it will result in great good by arousing attention, discussion, and intelligent action on the subject, that will eventually giv us a safe, reliable, practical, Liberal mutual aid society."

For nigh five years I hav carefully studied and hav urged the formation of such a society, gladly receiving suggestions, thankful for objections, learning from actual membership in three mutual cooperativ insurance societies, and study of the plans of very many others. And yet I am only the more anxious to hav some better scheme than I can devise adopted, or at least that what, after years of careful study and consultation with the best actuaries of the United States, is self-evidently safe, economical, and practical, shall be perfected by such amendments as the judgment or experience of more able persons may advise. For if Liberals organize a mutual aid society, it should be the very best in existence, profiting by the experience of all others, avoiding their mistakes, and embracing all their desirable features.

I find the actual cost of $2,000 insurance on lives selected with ordinary care and precaution, between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-five, is $11 per year; from thirty-five to forty-five, $17; from forty-five to sixty, $30.

Under twenty-one and over sixty are extra hazardous, and should not be taken.

If each policy was issued for $2,222, and the $222, at death of member, paid into the reserve fund of the society, and the $2,000 to heirs of the deceased, since the death average would be ten to every one thousand members each year, every death would secure $222 to the reserve fund, thus accumulating a fund proportionate with increase of membership, that affords security, and guarantees permanence of the society, combining all the security of the old line system with that of the cooperativ.

Let us compare the actual cost of insurance for $2,000, under this plan, with the cost—with no security—of the Grand Assembly of Progress.

Age, thirty-five; actual cost per year, $11. Cost by Grand Assembly of Progress, $28.

Age, forty-five; actual cost per year, $17. Cost by Grand Assembly of Progress, $36.

Age, sixty; actual cost per year, $30. Cost by Grand Assembly of Progress, $48.

This is on a basis of two thousand members. See page 17 of the constitution of the Grand Assembly of Progress.

Charters, $100 each (page 7). The articles furnished for the $100 (see page 24) any stationer could furnish for $20, and make more than ordinary profit.

Five dollars a week sick benefit to all members, rich or poor, is a delusion and an incentiv to fraud, and is utterly impracticable in a society with isolated members in every part of the civilized world (page 23).

The breadwinner, with wife and family of little children, sick, confined to his bed, needing medicins, extra little luxuries, careful, constant nursing, household expenses to be met, too often including rent—to such, $5 a week would be lamentably insufficient; to the well-to-do a mere bagatel; to some, with bad church heredity, a temptation to make "false claims." The only safe and really helpful sick benefit would be the necessary amount to secure needed attendance and comforts for the sick one, and provision for the sick member's dependent loved ones during the member's sickness and inability to attend to work or business. This can be secured by loans from the society's reserve fund, repayment secured by pledge of sick member's and two other members' policies. The time has come when a mutual aid society of Liberals is possible. It has long been greatly needed. I am much pleased to know that such men as Will S. Andres, of Portsmouth, O., are giving attention and urging prompt action in the matter, and most earnestly I solicit that other able Liberals, in the same kindly spirit of desire to promote the greatest good to our cause, will investigate, and through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER discuss this all-important matter. Let the subject, not persons, be fully discussed, and a plan devised or selected that will commend itself to all Liberals, a plan that shall afford the maximum of security at minimum of cost. And the widow and the orphan in their bereavement and dependence, and the Liberal, when misfortune, reverses, or business failure leave the $2,000 thus secured the one only provision for loved ones, will bless all who aid in the grand and noble work of organizing the Freethinker's mutual aid society.

Eminent Women.

ELIZABETH TEXTOR.

The greatness of the sons is the exuding of the greatness of mothers. . . .
The female contains all qualities and tempers them,
She is in her place and moves with perfect balance,
She is all things duly veiled, she is both passiv and activ. . . .
As I see one through a mist, one with inexpressible completeness, sanity, and beauty;
I see the bent head and arms folded over the breast,
The female I see.

Thus speaks the poet, and thus he proves it to us that woman is nature's masterpiece and "contains all."

Goethe was one of the greatest of German poets, and among the most Liberal as well. The greater part of his superiority was the "exuding" of the mother.

Her name was Elizabeth Textor; and wherever Goethe is known and loved this woman's name should be known and loved, yet how few hav ever fully realized he had a mother.

Professor Cottinger says of her: "She is one of the most pleasing figures in German literature, standing out with greater vividness than almost any other. She was a merry, genial, and whole-souled woman, of moderate culture . . . one of the rare women who make the world happier by the fact of their being in it."

After a lengthened interview with her Nicolovius exclaimed, "Now do I understand how Goethe has become the man he is."

She was only eighteen when the poet was born and they were both young together. She was fond of story-telling and mirth, order and humor. In a letter she says, "I am fond of people and everyone feels it directly, young and old; I pass without pretension through the world, and that gratifies men. I never 'bemoralize' anyone; always seek out the good in them and leave what is bad. In this way I make myself happy and comfortable."

Thus we see the happy mother gave the genial, kind, and happy nature to her son, both by heredity and example. "She kept open house for all his friends, and no one who stood in any relation to Goethe could pass through Frankfort without stopping to pay regards to her."

When he returned home, in 1768, from Leipsic, broken in health, his father showed him the cold shoulder, for he wanted to see him further advanced in the study of jurisprudence; he did not understand that a poet's sphere is a different one. Mother and sisters, however, were touched by the worn face, and womanlike received him with affection, which compensated for his father's coldness. The father was a tyrant and the "poor mother [as so many other mothers hav done] had a terrible time of it, trying to pacify the children and stand between them and their father. . . . In 1808 she died, seventy-seven years old. To the last her love for her son, and his for her, had been the glory and sustainment of her happy old age. He had wished her to come and liv with him at Weimar; but the wishes of old Frankfort friends, and the influence of old habits, kept her in her nativ city, where she was venerated by all."

They who love the poet and philosopher, the scientist and thinker, Goethe, should love, remember, and venerate his mother, Elizabeth Textor.

With antecedents,
With my fathers and mothers, and the accumulations of past ages,
With all which had it not been,
I would not now be here as I am.—Whitman.

Snowville, Va. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Prohibition.

Some time ago a correspondent of your paper, seeking to establish the beneficence of Prohibition, referred to Kansas as indubitable proof of his proposition. I am in receipt of several letters asking if the party correctly stated the case, and if not, urging me to reply.

For twenty years prior to Prohibition in Kansas I was an activ Good Templar and worker in the temperance cause in Topeka, Valley Falls, and Troy in this state. When the Prohibition craze struck Kansas ten years ago there were about four hundred lodges and organizations of various kinds in the state devoted to temperance work. In six months they were all dead. Prohibition killed them. Moral, social, educational temperance work was wholly abandoned, and compulsion, litigation, and general hell-raising inaugurated in its stead. The infamous spy, spotter, and informer system was adopted, and secret, star-chamber, inquisitorial "law and order leagues" hatched conspiracies, waged bitter and vindictiv prosecutions, piled costs mountain-high upon the taxpayers, and converted society into a seething caldron of warring elements.

The golden era of sobriety was just beginning to dawn in Kansas when the pernicious contagion of Prohibition broke out like a raging pestilence and spread over the land, destroying temperance work and leaving moral desolation in its path. The consumption of liquor has been increased rather than diminished, and men hav been made worse instead of better. Prohibition has debauched our state. The attempted enforcement has drawn out the worst elements of human character on both sides of the question. Men who once had respect for law hav grown to hate and despise it, and their sons are following in their footsteps. In place of honest, old-fashioned saloons we hav drug stores, joints, club-rooms, and secret hell-holes, where vicious stuff is sold to all who want it, old or young.

Prohibition was not sprung upon Kansas for the purpose of promoting temperance. Far from it. It is simply an artful scheme on the part of the church to obtain prestige, prominence, and power; to enlarge its field of operation and to secure the recognition of its divine right to rule. It is a church crusade for empire. Nothing more, nothing less. The preachers are invariably its commissioned officers, the deacons, elders, and class-leaders are its sergeants and corporals, and the lay membership are its rank and file. Their houses of worship are its barracks and recruiting stations. They are used for caucusing, for planning campaigns, for plotting and hatching out their secret conspiracies, and for the delivery of ranting, fanatical lectures, speeches, and sermons.

Since the withering blight of Prohibition cast its dark shadow upon Kansas and Iowa, and converted those states into moral plague-spots, the former has lost seventy-two thousand of its population and the latter two hundred and ninety-five thousand, while all surrounding states hav gained from two to six hundred thousand each. And as many more people would flee from the church rule and blue-lawism of those two states if they could sell out and get away, or if they did not hope for a change in affairs.

For one, I am not a law-worshiper. I never did believe in padlock virtue, legal righteousness, sheriff honor, execution honesty, Comstock purity, or constable temperance. I do not believe that state guardianship of men's appetites and morals and the removal of all temptation from them is conduciv to the best results in developing human character. I do not believe in putting bib and diaper on a man and shutting him up in the nursery with old grannies Church and State for his wet and dry nurses. I do not believe in trailing him up to the legislativ porch like a morning glory, cultivating no power within himself to stand alone, and sure to be cut down by the first chill wind or autumn frost.

Temptation is as necessary a factor in the building up of character as exercise is in the growth of a strong, healthy body. Without temptation it is impossible to develop a vigorous manhood, capable of resisting evil as the sturdy oak withstands the fury of storm and tempest. Without temptation man would be a frail hot-house exotic, a thing of jelly, without bone, sinew, muscle, or vertebra. The moment temptation is removed, moral degeneration begins. Free moral agency is essential to manhood. No good can possibly come from the destruction of human liberty.

To sum up the case, Prohibition is only another name for puritanic hydrophobia. In principle it is false, irrational, and unjust; in spirit it is aggressiv, ferocious, and vindictiv. It is the cessation of liberty, the foe of free moral agency, and the destroyer of temperance. It is social plague, moral pestilence, political contagion, commercial famin, and financial ruin. It is the distilled essence of fanaticism, hypocrisy, and hatred—the bastard offspring of pharisaical bigotry and political demagogism. It is degrading, enslaving, and demoralizing to a free and intelligent people. It begets disrespect for all law; it offers a premium upon vice and crime, and turns men into sneaks, spies, spotters, and perjurers. Its enactment and attempted enforcement in the states of Kansas and Iowa hav been an infamous outrage upon the natural and civil rights of the people opposed to it. It is the progenitor of discord, hatred, and bitterness, the instigator of contention, enmity, and rancor, and the propagator of strife, dissension, and violence. It is a base conspiracy of raving cranks, frothing fanatics, gibbering lunatics, frenzied bigots, designing knaves, rotten demagogs, and unprincipled politicians who would apply the torch of conflagration to the glorious temple of liberty bequeathed us by our fathers, and dance in fiendish revelry around the smoking ruin. The Escape of a Seventh Day Adventist.

W. H. McKee, secretary of the National Religious Liberty Association—a "Seventh Day" religious organization—reports in the organ of his society:

Mr. L. A. Callicott, of Lanes, Dyer county, Tenn., was tried some time since, under the Tennessee statute forbidding Sunday labor, and found guilty, but a new trial was ordered, which took place July 21st, before Judge Flippin. Col. T. E. Richardson, who is counsel in the famous King case, which has gone to the United States district court, defended Mr. Callicott. The defendant is a Seventh Day Adventist, and the question was broached as to whether the commandment, "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work," made it a sin for him to rest on Sunday. E. E. Marvin, an elder of the Seventh Day Adventist denomination, was put upon the witness-stand and the following was elicited, as reported in the Review and Herald:

Colonel Richardson: "Mr. Marvin, where do you liv?"
Mr. Marvin: "At Trezevant, Carroll county, Tenn."
Colonel Richardson: "Are you a minister of the Seventh Day Adventist church?"
Mr. Marvin: "Yes, sir."
Colonel Richardson: "What is the belief and practice of your church concerning the Sabbath?"
Mr. Marvin: "We believe the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord, as brought to view in Ex. xx, and keep it as such; and with James ii, 12, we believe this to be a law of liberty, and that we hav a heaven-born right to obey it in any state or nation."
Colonel Richardson: "You regard it as a Christian duty to keep that day holy and no other?"
Mr. Marvin: "Yes, sir."
Colonel Richardson: "Does your church hold that the working upon six days is as imperativ as the keeping of the seventh?"
Mr. Marvin. "No, sir."
Attorney-general: "Mr. Marvin, what is the position of your people as to working six days?"
Mr. Marvin: "They hav never officially or publicly expressed any rule concerning it."
Attorney-general: "Do your people teach that it is a sin to rest on Sunday?"
Mr. Marvin: "We believe that when required to——"
Attorney-general: "But answer my question."
Mr. Marvin: "I will, sir, if you giv me opportunity."
Attorney-general: "Well, go on, then."
Mr. Marvin: "We believe that when required to rest on Sunday, by laws based upon the religious aspect of the day, it would be wrong to obey them."
Attorney-general: "Do laws, requiring men simply to rest, tend to enforce religion or worship?"
Mr. Marvin: "Yes, sir, if such laws be Sunday laws."
Attorney-general: "On what grounds?"
Mr. Marvin: "On the grounds that there is not now, or ever was, a Sunday law, that did not hav for its basis the religious character of the day."
Attorney-general: "But it would not interfere with your religion to rest on Sunday?"
Mr. Marvin: "Yes, sir. Sunday-keeping is a religious act—an act of worship; it would be conforming to an opposing religion."

The attorney-general then yielded the case, and the judge charged the jury to bring in a verdict of not guilty.

This testimony is worthy of note, for it brings out the pith of the whole question of Sunday laws. Sunday-keeping is a religious act, nothing else—never was anything else since the Babylonians and their ancestors established the worship of the sun god, which the "venerable Day of the Sun" perpetuates to the present hour, with the added sanctities of the Christian Sabbath attached in these later times.

If any man believes that "the seventh day" is the Sabbath of the Lord his God, to compel him to yield a formal allegiance to the first day (the Day of the Sun) is forcing him to conform "to an opposing religion."

The judge in this case charged rightly.

A "Holy Father."

Translation from the Italo-Americano, New York, Aug. 9, 1890.

A Jesuit priest of the name of Giuseppe (Joseph) died unexpectedly in a confessional of the church of San Luigi of Rome whilst listening to the confession of a young girl who claims to be his daughter. She had confessed to incestuous relations with her own brother. Not knowing of this latter matter, the wretched priest was so struck with horror at it that the apoplexy killed him instantly.

Gems of Thought.

A UNIVERSAL God ought to hav revealed a universal religion. By what fatality then are there so many religions on earth?—Holbach.

IT must, indeed, hav been pardonable to doubt of the divinity, when his only announcers disputed on his nature. Nearly all the first fathers of the church made God corporeal; and others, after them, giving him no extent, lodged him in a part of heaven. According to some, he had created the world in time; while, according to others, he had created time itself. Some gave him a son like to himself; others would not grant that the son was like to the father. It was also disputed in what way a third person proceeded from the other two. There were disputes about his mother, his descent into hell and into limbo; the manner in which the body of the God-man was eaten and the blood of the God-man was drunk; on grace; on the saints, and a thousand other matters. The confidants of the divinity were seen so much at variance among themselvs, anathematizing one another from age to age, but all agreeing in an immoderate thirst for riches and grandeur.—Voltaire.

MAN . . . trusted God was love indeed
And love creation's final law—
Though Nature, red in tooth and claw
With ravin, shrieked against his creed.
—Tennyson.

WHO can appreciate the mercy of so making the world that all animals devour animals; so that every mouth is a slaughter-house, and every stomach a tomb?—Ingersoll.

THERE is not necessarily any gross and ugly facts which may not be eradicated from the life of man. We should endeavor practically in our lives to correct all the defects which our imagination detects. The heavens are as deep as our aspirations are high. So high as a tree aspires to grow, so high it will find an atmosphere suited to it.—Thoreau.

POPULATION will mightily increase, and the earth will be a garden. Governments will be conducted with the quietude and regularity of club committees. The interest which is now felt in politics will be transferred to science; the latest news from the laboratory of the chemist, or the observatory of the astronomer, or the experimenting room of the biologist, will be eagerly discussed. Poetry and the fine arts will take that place in the heart which religion now holds. Luxuries will be cheapened and made common to all; none will be rich, and none poor. Not only will man subdue the forces of evil that are without; he will also subdue those that are within. He will repress the base instincts and propensities which he has inherited from the animals below; he will obey the laws that are written on his heart; he will worship the divinity within him. As our conscience forbids us to commit actions which the conscience of the savage allows, so the moral sense of our successors will stigmatize as crimes those offenses against the intellect which are sanctioned by ourselvs. Idleness and stupidity will be regarded with abhorrence. Women will become the companions of men and the tutors of their children. The whole world will be united by the same sentiment which united the primeval clan, and which made its members think, feel, and act as one. Men will look upon this star as their fatherland; its progress will be their ambition; the gratitude of others their reward. These bodies which we now wear belong to the lower animals; our minds hav already outgrown them; already we look upon them with contempt. A time will come when science will transform them by means which we cannot conjecture, and which, even if explained to us, we could not now understand, just as the savage cannot understand electricity, magnetism, steam. Disease will be extirpated; the causes of decay will be removed; immortality will be invented.—Winwood Reade.

MATTER was from the beginning in God, and is hence eternal and unending. The earth, the dust, every created thing indeed, perishes; but we cannot say that that perishes out of which they are created. Substance abides eternally. A thing falls into dust, but out of the dust is developed another. The earth, as Pliny says, is a phenix and remains once for all. When it becomes old it burns itself to ashes that out of them a young phenix may arise, the former but rejuvenated.—Sebastian Frank.

NOTHING appears to be really durable, eternal, and worthy of the name of a principle save matter only. Matter as the Absolute includes within itself all forms and dimensions. But the infinity of forms under which matter appears is not accepted by her from another nor as it were only in outward appearance, but she brings them forth from herself and bears them from her own womb. Where we say there is death, there is only the outgoing toward new life, a loosing of one union which is the binding into a new.—Giordano Bruno.

WEDRON, ILL., Aug. 25, 1890.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, New York, N. Y., Gents: "Pictorial Text-Book" received last night. Every Liberal should hav one and should try and sell them among his neighbors. The cartoons are plain and distinct, the explanatory reading matter is excellent, and it is a large book for the small price asked for it. I hav had it but a few hours and hav sold six copies. Will giv you an order as soon as I see the balance of the community. Only one Liberal in the six names I got. They liked the cartoons exposing Catholicism, and I think after getting the book will open their eyes on their own system. I would advise Liberals, however, not to explain the cartoons to over one Catholic at a time, as they dislike seeing themselvs as others see them.

Yours truly, M. P. BRAFFET.

Again Our Generous Friend.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 9th we gratefully acknowledged on our own part a donation of $50 from Mr. F. A. Day, of Castana, Iowa; and also $50 for the Secular Union and $100 for Mr. Reynolds to use in making Washington a secular state.

Mr. Day has again shown his generosity and made another grateful acknowledgment necessary by a gift to THE TRUTH SEEKER of $100, and the same amount to Mr. Reynolds to help that warrior along.

We regret to learn from his sons that Mr. Day is in poor health, but it pleases us to know that he can occasionally find forgetfulness of pain in enjoying the contents of the Pictorial Text-Book, the first copy of which that came from the press was mailed to him.

Why the State Should Not Teach Religion.

To the Catholic Review must be given credit for honest frankness, though perhaps it speaks as it does because the Roman church thinks the times will stand an avowal of its purpose. The Review heads an editorial with the query, "Why Should Not the State Pay for Religious Instruction?" and goes on to say:

"It seems to be taken for granted that the state should not pay for religious instruction. Even Catholics discussing the merits of the denominational plan, out of defense to popular prejudice, are careful to assure our Protestant friends that they do not ask the state to pay for religious instruction, but only for secular studies. But surely it is a pertinent question, Why should not the state pay for religious instruction in the public schools? Is there anything morally wrong in the idea? Would it necessarily involve injustice, or wrong to any class of people? Would it hav a deteriorating or demoralizing effect upon the pupils? In short, can anyone giv any good reason why the state should refuse to pay for religious as well as other instruction? What is the object of the state in providing for the education of the rising generation? Is it not to make good citizens? And what is the most important requisit for good citizenship? Is it not morality?"

When the Review can show that morality is promoted by religion, or that we should hav no morality without religion, or that religious people are always moral and irreligious people always immoral, then its questions will be answered as it desires. At present the facts, throughout history, are against it.

It seems to be necessary to continually remind the priests that "morality has nothing to do with religion. Morality appeals to the experience of mankind. It cares nothing about faith, nothing about sacred books. Morality depends upon facts, something that can be seen, something known, the product of which can be estimated. It needs no priest, no ceremony, no mummery. The morality of the world is not distinctivly Christian. Zoroaster, Gautama, Mohammed, Confucius, Christ, and, in fact, all founders of religions, hav said to their disciples: You must not steal; you must not murder; you must not bear false witness; you must discharge your obligations. Christianity is the ordinary moral code, plus the miraculous origin of Jesus Christ, his crucifixion, his resurrection, his ascension, the inspiration of the Bible, the doctrin of the atonement, and the necessity of belief. Buddhism is the ordinary moral code, plus the miraculous illumination of Buddha, the performance of certain ceremonies, a belief in the transmigration of the soul, and in the final absorption of the whole by the infinit. The religion of Mohammed is the ordinary moral code, plus the belief that Mohammed was the prophet of God, total abstinence from the use of intoxicating drinks, a harem for the faithful here and hereafter, ablutions, prayers, alms, pilgrimages, and fasts."

If we are to hav religion taught in the schools, whose religion shall it be?

Does the Review think that it would be justice to use a Freethinker's money to pay priests to educate somebody's children in Catholicism? Would it be justice to teach an Infidel's child the Catholic catechism?

The state should not pay for religious instruction in the public schools for the reason that it is not the state's business. Religion is a question for each person to decide for himself. The public schools are for the children of everyone, and it could not be otherwise than a wrong inflicted upon some child to hav religion taught therein—some Freethinker, some Protestant, some Catholic, some Jew. And for the State to provide schools for each sect would be impossible. It would ruin the people to pay the taxes to support them. There are some two hundred sects of Christians in the world, and the United States has samples of about all of them. Schools would hav to be multiplied forty-fold. There is no feasible plan to educate children in public schools that will not work injustice except to make them strictly secular and leave their religious education to their parents.

The state should not teach religion for another reason. Religion is the enemy of the state, in that it diverts the attention of men from this world to another, and teaches them to sacrifice this world to that other. This weakens the ties that hold families and states together, and has a tendency to reduce society to anarchy. Which is worth the more to the state—to civilized society—a community of begging monks or a community of secular workers? Why, then, should the state teach religion?

The Beggars, the Soldiers, and the Preachers.

Our Canadian contemporary, Secular Thought, says:

"In Brazil, under the new regime, it has been decided that 'beggars, soldiers, and clergymen' shall be disfranchised. This is right. The business of clergymen is to prepare men for the next world—not for this one; and as they get exemption from almost all taxation, the rule of 'no taxation without representation' should in their case be rendered 'no taxation, no vote.'"

But it is not right, though it may be expedient considering the character of the clergy and their proneness to maneuver for the aggrandizement of the church. Ministers should be treated the same as men, and so should women. Giv them freedom and suffrage, treat them as though they were not dependents, and they will come out all right in time. The clergy are not wholly to blame for the anomalous position they occupy. The people are so superstitious that they let the priests bamboozle them with hellfire and heaven, but then, some of the preachers are honest and don't know any better themselvs. The tax exemptions are the work of the people, and the clergy hav just as good right to vote as the stupidly superstitious or knavishly dishonest politicians who enacted the law. As for soldiers—who has a better right to vote than the man who is defending his country? And the beggars—well, that hits our friends the preachers again, but isn't there a text somewhere that the poor shall inherit the earth—and when they inherit it let them rule it.

Ancient Men and Ancient Religions.

Another Southern subscriber has applied for information, this time for the benefit of the clergy. Mr. H. T. Ward, of Coaling, Ala., writes:

"Will you giv me the best authorities on pre-Adamic man, and on a religion older than the Bible purports to be? I told a minister we had evidence of men and religion older than described by the Bible. He said he wanted to see it; that he was well read in geology and history and had never seen anything of it. He wanted the evidence to be as authentic as the Encyclopedia Britannica."

Without making any reflections upon the reverend gentleman's general lack of information upon a subject he claimed to be "read in," we will note some facts and opinions bearing on the subject; and, as he thinks the Encyclopedia Britannica will convince him, let us first quote that eminent authority, after premising a few things.

The Bible account of creation we will assume to be familiar to our clerical friend. That account givs the beginning of the world—according to accepted Christian chronology—as about six thousand years ago. The human race is supposed to be descended from a single pair—Adam and Eve—created specially by God. If this is not so—if the earth is older and has been peopled more than six thousand years; and if the human race is not descended from Adam and Eve, then the well-read minister is in error.

The article on Geology in the Encyclopedia Britannica occupies pages 189 to 324, and it is therefore impossible, in the limits of an editorial, to quote it entire. But we may, perhaps, afford our friend's clerical friend some hints of its contents. "Geology," begins Professor Archibald Geikie, the writer of the article, "is the science which investigates the earth. Geology shows that the present races of plants and animals are the descendants of other and very different races which once peopled the earth. It teaches that there has been a progress of the inhabitants, as well as one of the globe on which they dwell." This progress of life the geologists hav divided into periods, as follows:

"I. Archæan Time.—The beginning, including a very long era without life, and, finally, that in which appeared the earliest and simplest forms of plants and animals.

"II. Silurian Age, or Age of Invertebrates.—The animal life consisting distinctivly of Invertebrates.

"III. Devonian Age, or Age of Fishes.—Fishes, a division of Vertebrates (the earliest of which had appeared before the close of the Silurian), the dominant race.

"IV. Carboniferous Age, or Age of Acrogens, and eminently also the Age of Amphibians.—Characterized by Coal-plants, which were chiefly of the tribe of Acrogens, a tribe that then had its grandest exhibition; and in animal life, by the earlier Reptils, belonging mostly to the lower division, Amphibians.

"V. Age of Reptils.—Reptils the dominant race.

"VI. Tertiary Age, or Age of Mammals.—Mammals the dominant race.

"VII. Quaternary, or Age of Man."

These periods, of course, are not distinct, but overlap each other. The time of each geologists do not pretend to giv. They call them "vast periods," "enormously remote epochs," "myriads of ages," etc., etc., which indicate millions of years. Man began in the Vertebrate type in the prone or horizontal fishes, and completed his career, as we now see him, in the "Recent or Human Period," as Geikie calls it, known as the Quaternary (or Post-tertiary) age. By the discovery of human bones and implements manufactured by man it has been established that man has existed on the earth for many, many thousands of years. Some scientists, like Sir William Thompson, say one hundred thousand; others, like Denton, say hundreds of thousands. Most of them prefer not to speculate on the subject. But one thing is most positivly asserted by all—that six thousand years is not a moment in comparison with the years that hav elapsed. Baldwin says: "It is now as certain as anything else in ancient history, that Egypt existed as a civilized country not less than five thousand years earlier than the birth of Christ" (Prehistoric Nations, p. 32). But this is nearly one thousand years before the creation of man, according to Genesis; yet Egypt was then a civilized country. Lenormant, in his "Manual of the Ancient History of the East," though anxious to make his readers believe that the Bible and history are in perfect harmony, acknowledges that "undoubtedly, positiv facts prove that the antiquity of man on the earth is much greater than has been inferred from an inexact and too narrow interpretation of the biblical narrativ"

(Manual, p. 39). He places the first dynasty of Egyptian kings at 5004 B.C., or one thousand years before the creation of man, according to Genesis (Manual, p. 197). Sir Charles Lyell (Antiquity of Man, p. 204) givs us a period of more than a hundred thousand years from the present, for the time when the primitiv men of France lived, whose remains hav been found in the valley of the Somme, with those of extinct elephants, lions, bears, hyenas, etc. Ansted, in his "Earth's History," says, "It would appear that the lowest human remains must be of a date carrying us back a quarter of a million of years" (Earth's History, p. 185). Page tells us, "There is the amplest evidence of man having been an inhabitant of western Europe for ages preceding the popularly received chronology" (Man: Where, Whence, and Whither? p. 183). Broca, the anthropologist, says, "Man has left traces of his existence, marks of his industry, and remains of his body, in geological strata, the antiquity of which is beyond computation." He adds, "A person may easily convince himself that six thousand years constitute but a short moment in the life of humanity" (Anthropological Review, 1868, p. 47). Lesley says, "My own belief is but the reflection of the growing sentiment of the whole geological world—a conviction strengthening every day, as you may with little trouble see for yourselvs by glancing through the magazines of scientific literature—that our race has been upon the earth for hundreds of thousands of years."

The Encyclopedia Britannica (Vol. ii, p. 102), which our friend so greatly reverences, says: "It is no longer necessary to discuss these chronologies [Archbishop Usher's and other theologians'], inasmuch as new evidence has so changed the aspect of the subject, that the quasi-historical schemes of the last century would now hardly be maintained by any competent authority of any school. Geology, notwithstanding the imperfection of its results, has made it manifest that our earth must hav been the seat of vegetable and animal life for an immense period of time; while the first appearance of man, though comparativly recent, is positivly so remote that an estimate between twenty and a hundred thousand years may fairly be taken as a minimum. This geological claim for a vast antiquity of the human race is supported by the similar claims of prehistoric archeology and the science of culture, the evidence of all three departments of inquiry being intimately connected, and in perfect harmony."

We think this evidence is sufficient. If not, our clerical friend may refer to Lubbock's "Prehistoric Races," or any of the dozens of works on this subject. We particularly recommend Professor White's articles in the July and September numbers of the Popular Science Monthly, and succeeding chapters of his work on the "Warfare of Science." Also the articles on geology and anthropology in the Encyclopedia Britannica.

The origin of religion—the invention of deities, the worship of idols, gods, and God—is involved in obscurity. Savage man invented his religious abstractions and concrete forms of worship long before he had invented any method of leaving a record of them. It is therefore a question not of the earliest religion, but of the earliest records of religion. These are found in Egypt, India, Chaldea, and later scholars are beginning to find them in prehistoric America. The Egyptians, says Herbert Spencer, out of their primitiv ideas of gods, brute and human, evolved spiritualized ideas of gods, and finally of a god; until the priesthoods of later times, repudiating the earlier ideas, described them as corruptions. Religion has been a growth. As man himself has grown from brute to savage, from savagery to his present estate, so religion has grown from fetichism, worship of snakes, toads, idols, to its present forms. Man never had a decent god till he became civilized, and the higher the civilization the better the God. "God" is the reflex of man.

The Jewish written records go back but a few centuries before Christ—six or seven. The Egyptians go back about four thousand years. The identity of the Jewish legends with those of Persia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Egypt shows whence they were derived. Especially is this true of the accounts of the creation and deluge. The Chinese, the Hindoos, and the ancient Mexicans, too, hav legends similar to those found in the Old Testament in the book of Joshua. The Indian and Chinese records and religions are many hundreds if not thousands of years older than the Jewish. The Egyptians were civilized centuries before the time of Moses (alleged to be about 1500 B.C)., and it was from them that the Jews obtained their monotheistic ideas. But Moses did not make the pentateuchal record. That was done by writers who lived centuries later. On these facts there is no difference of opinion among biblical scholars now, as it is quite the easiest thing in the world to show that the records of the Jews are later than those of other nations. And as the human race is not descended from Adam and Eve, but has been on the earth tens of thousands of years, so religion did not spring from "God's chosen people," but has been a common phenomenon among men. The most plausible origin ascribed is perhaps that of Herbert Spencer in his "Principles of Sociology." An outline of the various religions of the last four thousand years would require too much space for it to be here attempted. There are similarities in all of them, and the more modern cannot claim to be the original. If our friend's clerical friend be really desirous to dig into this subject, we will recommend to him a few books from which he will obtain the needed information.

New York's Clerical Politicians.

When the People's Municipal League was formed in this city last June a clerical committee, composed of thirty-four preachers and priests of all denominations, was attached. Among the names put on this committee was that of Mike Corrigan, a Catholic archbishop who runs this burg politically. Commenting upon this appointment, THE TRUTH SEEKER said:

"If the committee hope that Corrigan will help to overthrow the rule of Tammany Hall they show themselvs totally unacquainted with his church and wholly unfit to take part in any practical affairs of life. Corrigan's church gets all that can be given it through Tammany, and has no reason to desire a change. Neither will she divide with the Protestants. The Protestants' legislativ stronghold is Albany, among the country Protestant members, to whom they owe all the subsidies now enjoyed by them. Rome has got New York, and the honor of figuring among a respectable committee of Protestant clergy will not induce Corrigan to 'divvy' the booty."

It seems that it is only recently that the Catholic church authorities found out that Corrigan was expected to join in the movement, and the vicar-general, Mr. T. S. Preston, who represents the archbishop while that official is in Rome, promptly asked that his name be left off the roll. Mr. Heber Newton replied to Mr. Preston, and the reply called out this emphatic letter from the vicar-general:

"The reply of the Rev. R. Heber Newton to my letter seems to call for a brief answer. In the first place, I do not agree with him that a gentleman's name may be used at any time without his expressed consent. Secondly, all letters addressed to the archbishop during his absence from the city hav been sent to me, and no letter asking his consent to the use of his name by the 'Municipal League' has been received. Had such a letter been received I should at once, in his name, hav refused consent. The very day on which I saw the circular of the committee I addressed my letter to the Sun.

"Now, in conclusion, I assert that I hav full authority from the archbishop, and as his representativ I demand that his name shall be 'taken from the list' of the committee of clergymen. This I do with all politeness, but with decision, while, as before, I make no comment upon the purposes of the league or the purity of its intentions. Very respectfully,

"THOMAS S. PRESTON, Vicar-General.

"St. Ann's Church, New York, Aug. 25, 1890."

The committee of clergymen were very foolish to think that the Catholic church is dissatisfied with the present political status in this city; and if they really did think so, it shows them to be utterly incompetent to deal with general affairs. Tammany Hall is the secular end of the Romish church, and for Corrigan to work against it would be to work against himself. The Hall, when in power, givs the Romish church every penny it can from the public treasury, and Tammany officeholders contribute every month from their private salaries to the force which none know better than they gave them their positions.

Nothwithstanding the defection of the archbishop, however, we are going to hav religion in politics this fall. The managers of the Committee of Clergymen hav officially announced that the work of the committee "promises to be of the most practical kind." In support of this announcement the statement is made that "for the purpose of the campaign the churches are being regarded like so many political clubs." The members of the churches "will be asked to distribute the campaign literature, which is now being prepared for the purpose of showing in detail the corruption of the present city government. Municipal reform clubs are being rapidly organized in different congregations, and their activity will be utilized in connection with the regular work done by the committee on enrollment." About the middle of this month, too, "a monster meeting of all the clergy of the city, without regard to denomination, will be held. An address, which is now being prepared by Dr. Howard Crosby, and the committee of which he is the chairman, will be laid before this meeting. This address is designed to express the conviction that the gross abuses of the city government imperativly need reform, and it is a duty of the members of every church, whatever may be their creed or shade of belief, to unite in the work of correction. The address will go forth from this meeting as an appeal on the part of the clergy of New York to the laity to unite with them in the endeavor to bring about municipal reform. At this meeting it is proposed to discuss the moral and philanthropic aspects of the campaign. Not only are past evils to be mended, but the future good to be done will also be considered."

Just what this participation in politics of the clergy will do for the city it is difficult to say. A politician who was applied to by a reporter for his opinion was greatly interested. "I don't know exactly what it means," said he, "but it seems to point toward a piously paternal government under which we shall all hav to go to church twice every Sunday. I once heard of a man so truly good that he opened oysters with prayer. But that is not any worse than some of the things that come into one's mind in considering the good that may be done by these good people when they get hold of the city government."

The "good" that these people would do, if they could get hold of the city government, would be to put their friends in office, giv all the money they could to the Protestant churches, and shut New York up from Saturday night to Monday morning so tight that even prayer wouldn't open it. "The interests of God's rights" was one of the announced principles of the movement when started; and, as we said then, those who hav read ecclesiastical history will hav little difficulty in understanding it. "God's rights" are the clergy's rights—their right to dictate to the people; to be supported by the people; to hav state funds used for their own purposes; to be exempt from paying taxes; and to be generally high cockalorums in the community, dealing out punishment to their enemies, favors to their friends, and torture and death to Infidels and those who scoff at their pretensions.

We cannot agree with the evening Post that the centers of intelligence are the churches, and that if we are ever to redeem the city from Tammany control the Protestant clergy must lead the way. We do not want to swap one set of church thieves for another set. There never was a time or place when or where clergymen controled the government that criminal corruption and intolerable tyranny did not bear sway. And there is no reason to think that the Protestant churches would run this city any better than the Romish church now does. It is true that the average Protestant is more intelligent than the average Catholic, but intelligence used in a bad cause makes worse results for the victims than ignorance. Aud we hav never seen any indisposition on the part of Protestant churchmen to grab all the cash and favors for themselvs they could. In this respect they hav been behind the Romanists in power only.

What this city needs is a secular government, honestly administered, without any reference to religion or for the benefit of any religious sect.

THE destructiv tornado which whirled through Wilkesbarre, Pa., last week cut up many curious capers. It mowed a swath from one to five hundred feet wide, wrecking some three hundred buildings, and killing twenty persons. "Providence," of course, has come in for its, or his—what is it?—share of praise and blame for not destroying or for destroying. The tornado hit the leading Catholic church and sadly battered it, and when a pious woman remarked on the streets this morning, "How wonderful are the ways of providence," a sharp-tongued old Irishwoman, with a green handkerchief knotted about her shoulders, rejoined: "Sure Oi think it was the work of the divil. Look you there is the church spoilt intoirely, and the brewery's big chimney with never a hurt." Recently, the more pious of our population hav inclined to lay these atmospheric disturbances upon God, they alleging that he is angry at the people for not giving more money and power to his ministers. Perhaps the old Irishwoman's remark will now incline them to giv the devil his due.

Letters from Friends.

WALLA WALLA, WASH., Aug. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much interested in the publication of the picture book, and a subscriber here will assuredly buy copies as soon as it is published. ALVIN OLSEN.

MILLERSBURG, O., Aug. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I think your paper is doing its work well. It has won its way deep into the hearts of its readers, and I hope it will be read by all good citizens and Freethinkers. THE TRUTH SEEKER has become a necessity to the Liberal cause. It enlightens where the Bible darkens.

Yours truly, D. J. SCHILLING.

SEATTLE, WASH., July 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to inform you that a certain party of this city on the Fourth of July last raised a large number of small American flags in front of his place of business, all upside down but one flag, the stars at the bottom corner instead of the top. This is a specimen of some of our foreign-born American citizens of this place. THOS. WEEDEN.

OPHIR, CAL., Aug. 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please inform me by return mail, or in the next TRUTH SEEKER, why Heston's pictures are discontinued in the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. The paper looks forlorn without them; it looks as if our cause was retrograding.

Yours for truth, liberty, and pictures, LEWIS KAISER.

[Evidently Mr. Kaiser has not read THE TRUTH SEEKER very diligently, or he would know that Mr. Heston, the designer of our pictures, is sick and has gone to Colorado seeking to regain his health. When he finds it he will resume his labors for our readers. This, we trust, will be very soon.—ED. T. S.]

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOME,
QUINCY, ILL., Aug. 9, 290.

MR. EDITOR: The catalog you sent me is going round among the cottages, as your papers always do. I am almost frantic with desire and determination to do more to overthrow superstition. Oh, how it disgusts me to see so many going to Sabbath-school to hav their pure minds corrupted. It seems to me that if each Liberal was as thoroughly convinced as I am of the degrading influence of the Bible doctrins, and as willing to assist in testifying and proving the same, and as willing to contribute according to his means, it would only be a short time before the Nine Demands would be complied with, Ingersoll would be the acknowledged leader of the moral, religious, and intellectual forces of our republic, and THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator the leading organs of our press.

EX-REV. JOSEPH P. MAXEY.

PUNTA GORDA, CAL., Aug. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $5 inclosed, for which forward to the above address THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and the cartoon book when ready. No cartoons in the last few numbers. I hope nothing serious has happened to Brother Heston to stop his work. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is one hundred per cent better with cartoons than without them. In the house that I reside in is a family of seven children, all baptized into the Catholic church, the mother being a Catholic, the father an Infidel. I lay THE TRUTH SEEKERS about and the pictures attract the attention of the children. Then follows sometimes a reading of the passages annexed, which givs me an opening to explain to them, which, if the pictures were not there, I could not very well do. They, the pictures, attract the children, and it is they we want to capture most. I hope the pictures will not be discontinued.

H. S. BARRETTE.

SEATTLE, WASH., Aug. 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to ask you through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER if there is any law in Illinois and New York compelling parents who through idleness or drunkenness are unable to provide for their offspring, on commission by the court to giv them up to Catholic reformatories. Mother Burnard and six other sisters from St. Paul, Minn., are about to start a place of that kind in Seattle. She says this is the law in all large cities. Homeless girls are picked up on the streets and shoved into these dives, as I call them. THOMAS WEEDEN.

[There is a law in New York, and we believe in Illinois and many other states, allowing police magistrates to commit to "reformatories," "protectories," or "asylums," both Catholic and Protestant, vagrant children, or the children of drunken and pauper parents. The county of New York pays the institutions within its limits $2 per week for boarding them. So profitable has this religious sectarian industry become that the institutions keep agents at the courts. In this city the Westchester Catholic Protectory gets about $250,000 per annum; the New York Juvenil Asylum (Protestant) nearly as much; and various smaller institutions sums in proportion to the business they do. What the Catholics can do in Seattle must depend on state laws and local ordinances. The attention of the Washington State Secular Union should be called to the proposed institutions.—ED. T. S.]

GORDONVILLE, TEX., Aug. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed a little sketch in the last number of your excellent journal to which I hope you will allow me to reply, viz., a piece signed "Calvin." The man who sleeps with the Bible under his pillow, as a general thing, like a man who sleeps with a weapon under his head, is one who has done something bad or means to. In the first instance he seems to charge you with the destinies of your readers. Now, this I cannot comprehend—that is, how one man can be responsible for another's acts or thoughts. And as regards his idea of cyclones, tempests, lightning, hurricanes, etc., I cannot see why he considers them displays of an angry God. Do they not injure and destroy as many churches as saloons and gambling-hells? Do they not destroy as many private residences as houses of ill-fame? Do they not injure and even kill as many innocent women and children as cruel and wicked men? Why, then, censure God with such injustice as this? Does God not know a church from a saloon? Does God not know women and children, even innocent infants, from wicked men? Now, I hav not the slightest prejudice against the man at all, nor am I surprised at his ideas. There are some men who can believe anything; and I think it well to hav those restrained through fear of punishment or inspired through hope of reward, who cannot do right through principle. But for myself I prefer to do right from principle, regardless of consequences. D. J. TUCKER, M.D.

BYRON, MINN., Aug. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Will you kindly inform me who it is that funishes the most rum for Africa? A Baptist minister of this place asserts that it is an Infidel who is furnishing the rum for the heathen, and that Infidel, he said, lived in Boston.

I notice a letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 9th, by Mr. S. P. Benton, of Bowie, Tex., in which he mentions the importance of the Liberals organizing a protectiv or mutual organization similar to the Odd Fellows, except in the God business. I know of a good many respected citizens who hav been kept out on the account of being obliged to tell a lie in order to become a member of the Odd Fellows. Speaking for myself, I can say that I do not belong to any order that recognizes an infinit personal God as the ruler of nations, etc., but would hav been in the Odd Fellowship only for the reasons before mentioned. I would be glad to see an organization composed of Liberals—and why not? as we are strong enough, and can soon be organized if we only get to work. I hope it will be agitated until the desired results hav been attained. W. A. JOHNSON.

[Rum is sent to Africa from this and other countries. We do not know, and do not believe the Baptist minister knows, the creed or lack of creed of the individuals who ship it.—ED. T. S.]

COLLEGE POINT, N. Y., Aug. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me the use of your columns set aside for this purpose to say a few words to Mr. A. F. Banta, who took the liberty to call a certain class of political economists "cranks and cattle, for which he has no use and which every Liberal citizen should despise." Mr. Banta thus classifies the promoters of the best political and social system devised, the Anarchists. Why I write these lines to THE TRUTH SEEKER is, because I wish to show that among the Liberals there are just as narrow-minded, prejudiced, and ignorant people as among our opponents; it is a whole class, we only a few individuals. While I deeply respect the advanced opinions of them in regard to religious affairs, I hav only pity—never contempt—for their isolated position toward our present political strifes.

After reading Bennett's letters from Ludlow street jail, in 1879, when he was prosecuted by Republican ministers, judges, cabinet officers, etc., for sending alleged obscene writing through the United States mail; also when I think of the imprisonment of the noble Harman, and Heywood; of the exclusion of the "Kreutzer Sonata" by the most illustrious Republican postmaster-general; after reading so many thousands of little incidents that clearly show the downfall of a once great free-spirited party, now representing priestly tyranny, sectarian bigotry, corruption, and the suppression of individual rights, I cannot understand how a Liberal has such ideas of the Anarchists. One should think the present evil should at least make a Liberal think and try to find its cause. It is beyond my comprehension how a Liberal can consistently vote for either the Republican or Democratic party, especially for the first.

Mr. Banta and his class undoubtedly know that the bad Anarchists want to overthrow the "holy" Constitution of the United States, which they deem a most fearful crime, notwithstanding that the very same Constitution has provided for such a venture.

Mr. Banta says he despises the dirty Bible and its teaching—which I do too. He as well as I is of the opinion that the Bible is not what it claims to be. The Bible is not composed of teachings that the present world should or can follow, without returning to barbarism. Its doctrins, its explanations of geological, astronomical, and physical phenomena, are strictly opposit to the teachings of the science of the present time. That the Bible is full of immoral passages, of stupid stories, and of detrimental teachings can be proved. Then, we Liberals argue, the Bible teachings are not fit to liv by now, and consequently they never hav been. No man with common sense can expect that the present generation should liv according to rules written down by a barbarous race two thousand years ago.

This is exactly the case with the Constitution of the United States.

The Constitution has outlived its use. The enforcement is no more connected with blessings for the people. While I regard said document as one of the best documents of its kind ever written, I am not so inconsistent as to ask people over a hundred years past what we are to liv by. Even Socialism, if enacted, probably Anarchism, will make room for a still better system of political economy.

I hav studied carefully the protection policy, free trade (this latter is good), and single tax, and come to the final conclusion that Anarchism is the best; which I shall leave on the same day I shall find a better mode of reform.

I hav come across people who paraded a similar opinion of the much-abused Anarchists as Mr. Banta does. On asking what they advocate, they, the "anti-Anarchists," revealed to me the astonishing fact that the Anarchists want to kill everybody and destroy everything, use dynamite and nitro-glycerin by the ton. I presume Mr. Banta thinks so too. Otherwise how can he call men like Spencer, Phillips, Bakunin, Krapotkin, Most, Tucker, Pentecost, etc., cranks and cattle? I will leave it to the readers if this is fair or not, if this is liberal.

When a stupid boy of seventeen years I hav done the very same thing, and many, many times a deep feeling of shame overcomes me when I recollect my doings of the past.

THE TRUTH SEEKER'S attitude toward the Spiritualists should be an example of fairness to Mr. Banta and his class. I do not term Spiritualism a fraud before I hav examined it, before I hav done my duty, viz., to study a question before venturing an opinion. If Mr. Banta will take advice, I recommend him the reading of Tucker's Liberty, in Boston, Pentecost's Twentieth Century, Dyer Lum's book, "Economics of Anarchy." After a careful perusal of such literature he may utter an opinion. But even if he dislikes the Anarchistic method of evolution, I hope he will express his dislike in a more gentle manner.

A representativ Republican journal, also a first-class illustrated weekly, Frank Leslie's, of New York city, brought out an article some weeks ago entitled, "Objections Against the Enactment of Nationalism [Socialism]." There you will find the passage (I quote from memory, the meaning is the same): "Most Americans hav heretofore identified Socialism with Nihilism, viz., the destruction of everything save the followers of Nihilism. But Socialism has no more to do with arson, murder, or theft than Christianity has with the Inquisition. Socialism is simply a modern theory of reforming the present condition of public welfare."

Now, I see the time when newspapers will be forced by public opinion, by the spreading of wisdom and knowledge, to own that Anarchism has nothing to do with crime either.

Meanwhile I hope the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will investigate for themselvs the merits of the two great political questions of the present time, Socialism (Nationalism) and Anarchism. HERMAN BUCHER, JR.

KENT, O., Aug. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Catholicism reared in the world a temple of such magnitude as was never before seen. So gaudy was it, and so filthy, and so infested with sin-pedlers, at the close of the fifteenth century, that Brother Martin Luther said of Sin-hawker John Tetzel: "God helping me, I'll make a hole in his drum." Brother Martin not only made a hole in Tetzel's drum, but he put a charge of dynamite in this great temple of the church of Rome and demolished that end of it extending into western Europe. Catholic devotees patched up the wrecked building as best they could, while others gathered up the most prominent fragments of the old scattered temple and began constructing after their own ideas of "improvement." Among these constructors may be named Episcopalians and Presbyterians. If you will examin carefully these last named you will find that the cells are bespattered with "the blood of the faithful," and the floors stained with "the gore of heretics," quite a quantity of which has been shed since the reconstruction. The general structure of these edifices has very little attraction outside of curiosity, as they are composed, evidently, from material prepared by pagan hands. To be a worshiper in one of these is to freeze your soul, as there is nothing taught there which fires a human heart. To dwell in one of these temples would result in destroying your "mind's eye," as the little light that might come through their imperfect windows is excluded, such windows being hung full of the "cobwebs of past ages." In these days, the masses worship not in these temples, but many hav thought it wise to gather up some of the old lumber and build therewith "a house unto the Lord their God." Such a huge pile of old trash was there to select from that a fellow can pick out just whatever suits his make-up; for example, a "Hardshell Baptist" can find the hardest kind of material; hard enough to make partitions to exclude the noblest souls on earth; hard enough to construct banjos and harps to be played on to the glory of God because your mother, or sister, or infant child is roasting in hell! As to soft lumber, you can find anything to suit the softness of the individual, and as to rottenness, the old lumber pile has been culled all over for that kind, and from it hav been constructed a great variety of miniature temples, all whitewashed without and painted within, but underlaid with dead men's bones and all manner of uncleanness.

To lay aside this truthful but unpleasant description of these temples, I will remark that, for years, worshipers in various of the foregoing temples insisted that the Lord had designed me to be a preacher. Four different sects kindly offered to educate me for the ministry, i.e., each one supposing that afterward I would minister to their sect. Yes, they really desired to furnish me with the tools. These theological tools consist principally of a few ancient, rusty saws (dead languages) and a variety of old theological clawhammers. It takes a fellow from four to ten years to get the hang of the saws (Greek, Latin, and Hebrew), and then it takes about the third of the rest of his life to keep them filed up. But very few ever use these saws after they know how, excepting professors and D.D.'s, and these seldom ever use them for any other purpose than to hack one another's shins. As to the clawhammers (doctrins), they hav been used mostly to knock knowledge out of the worldling's head and faith into it, and to pound one another at intervals. No, thanks; I'd rather not use such tools nor spend my time in building useless temples out of rotten and filthy lumber.

To lay aside jesting, my desire is to help keep in repair this great and glorious temple erected to the goddess of Liberty. This grand temple, the American republic, was erected by Paine, Jefferson, Washington, and other statesmen, by the aid of the Revolutionary army, backed by the loyalty of the thirteen colonies. It became necessary for the Union army to throw itself around this magnificent edifice to save it from destruction planned by pope, priests, and Protestant monarchies. But, alas! this superb and world-renowned place of worship has become infested with money-changers, vice-propagators, and Jesuitical spies, and you may soon be aroused by an explosion which shall blow your fair temple into oblivion.

I hav had several calls to deliver my lecture, "The Foreign Element and its Dangers to the American Republic," and I am now contemplating spending the fall and winter in that work provided patriotic friends will open the door that I may enter and labor. The expense attending this need be but very little, as I wish to arrange to lecture every night or day in the week, including Sundays. All I ask is, that my expenses be paid from place to place and I be paid $2 a day for my labor. Railroad facilities are such there need not be a day lost. I hav no time for loafing; life with me is a reality, and as all kinds of plots are laid against the republic, I would like to do what little I can for its support. I wish to strike those points where the most foreigners are located, i.e., those who understand English. The lecture, dealing with government as it does, is not calculated to make the foreigner angry, as rudely and unwisely attacking his religion does, but is calculated to open his eyes to the enslaving power which is about to fall on him and the nation at large. Foreigners, even Catholics, are not so satisfied in their bondage as some Liberals seem to think. I speak from positiv knowledge, for twenty-five years of my early life was spent in Britain, and I know how the foreigner feels, and am convinced that a fearless, candid, and respectful presentation of this great question will help in liberating many from popish thralldom, and in starting that patriotic fire which is so necessary.

I shall probably start in northern Ohio, and move thence into Michigan. I write this to hear an expression from Liberals. All who think the subject suited to their neighborhood will please write me at once, so that I can commence mapping out my route of fall work. Yours in love of my adopted country, JOHN DAVEY.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Aug. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: If I did not believe the subject of this letter to be transcendently important there are many reasons why I should not write about it. But to my thinking the great question of the hour for Liberals is whether such writers as E. H. Heywood and Moses Harman should be vigorously encouraged, and a profound conviction that the Liberal cause is staked upon the battle they are fighting is what impels me to show reasons for so momentous a conclusion. Let me be understood. I am neither professing entire agreement with the views of sexual morality advanced by the writers, nor professing to know exactly what their views on this great subject are, nor even to know if they hav any in common. What they are fighting for is the right to discuss the subject. What I mean to say is that the Liberal cause is staked on their success in maintaining that right; and that all hesitancy, evasion, timidity, all talking for that right with buts and ifs and ands, deserves at the present crisis to be regarded as either clear, down cowardice or equally pernicious want of judgment. If a Liberal dislikes the language some of them use, or if he disapproves of their theories, the time is unsuitable for saying so. They are in prison for this language and these theories; and the only question which concerns us as Liberals is whether we will stick up for the right of sincere men, pure in their own lives, and accused by their enemies of nothing else than words, to advance even theories of which we disagree even in language which we disapprove, or whether we want a censorship of the press. Now, I perfectly understand that there can be two opinions on this point. If I did not know, both a priori and from experience, that there are opponents of ecclesiastical privilege and even of Christianity, who think that sentiments which they conceive unfavorable to chastity expressed in terms which offend their notions of delicacy are proper subjects for civil penalties, I should not be writing this. My contention is that such Liberals are most seriously mistaken. Observe, I do not say they are mistaken in their views upon the nature of either chastity or decency. The law, which is one thing in Wisconsin and quite another in Michigan, shall be the standard of chastity; the fashion, which is one thing now and was quite another fifty years ago, shall be the standard of propriety, for the purpose of this discussion. But that Liberalism which makes any moral rule too emphatic to be argued, any social convention too sacred to be left unguarded by a Comstock club, is recreant to the great principles of Liberalism which override all others—the principle that truth has nothing to fear from error, and the principle that abuse of free speech is a much less evil than the denial of free speech. As a punishment for this recreancy such Liberalism never fails to prove a feeble, useless negation. In Denmark about fifty years ago Liberalism was far stronger in appearance than it is now in America. Members of the legislature proposed to convert the churches into scientific schools. Ministers lectured every Sunday on such subjects as artificial manuring. All this fair promis passed away. The encyclopedias state, and I can easily believe, that Danish Liberalism died of its own shallowness. It could not cope with orthodoxy because it was afraid of subjects in which the average man is interested, while orthodoxy is not. Just such will be the end of American Liberalism if it proves another such a weakling. The thing resolves itself into this—either science tends to a higher morality than that of superstition or it does not. If it does not, then the morality of superstition is good enough without it. If it does, then this higher morality must be demonstrated in the only way it can be consistently with the first principles of Liberalism—that is, by leaving every fool at liberty to ventilate his folly and every wise man to refute it. Those Liberals, therefore, who take pains to wash their hands of Mr. Heywood's opinions or expressions, while neglecting to hit out for all they are worth at his persecution on account of these opinions or expressions, are aiding to inflict on Liberalism a mutilation which would prove fatal. They are assisting the movement in favor of ignorance; a movement which includes God in the Constitution, Sunday laws, Jasperian astronomy in schools supported by taxation, and which if it could hav full sway would restore all that was narrow, provincial, and mediocre in the Puritan regime, without reproducing the virtues of that obsolete social state. I can imagin nothing more monstrous, no more mermaid or centaur-like combination of all the evils of hypocrisy and all the evils of profligacy, than the external disciplin of the Blue Laws in a modern city like New York. There are other Liberals who are stealing the livery of morality to serve the devil of Comstockery in another way. They admit Mr. Heywood's right to discuss questions of high moment in the manner which he finds to giv his thought the freest utterance, but they abuse him for making them trouble. They say he "loads down Liberalism with unnecessary burdens." They prophesy that his persecution will end in "a general attack all along the line." This is exactly the kind of light which some enthusiasts hav proposed extracting from cucumbers. Do these timorous souls imagin that if we let the Comstock gang alone they will let us alone? Bosh! When D. M. Bennett was imprisoned by the gang all discussion of sexual matters was "obscene." Now the gang dare not prosecute on that charge except for using language which they can represent as gross. They hav been forced back to a position too illogical to be maintained, for, as Macaulay says, whether a particular thing shall be designated by a plain noun substantiv, or a circumlocution is a mere matter of fashion, with which morality has nothing whatever to do. He alone loads down Liberalism with unnecessary burdens who would saddle it with the incompatible obligations of keeping step to the music of progress and avoiding the omnibuses of stupidity. A general attack along the line is what we want; for it is what will teach these weak-kneed invertebrates that they must fight or die. Nothing for years has happened which pleased me so much as the recent attempt to exclude Frank Leslie's Weekly from the mails as an immoral publication, because it contained one of Ella Wheeler's erotic effusions. When journals like Frank Leslie's begin to feel the pressure, we shall soon bid Brother Comstock an everlasting adieu. But as long as he only dared to persecute a few Radical publishers, the average Yankee money-maker was content to let them suffer, not perceiving that the Puritan bigots would next be annoying himself. The average Yankee must be taught that his own liberties are bound up with ours! When he learns that, the fight is won. Hurrah, I say, for whoever helps to get the average Yankee once more in a corner, where he always proves a lion, though out of it he is only a cat. C. L. JAMES.

ST. JOSEPH, MICH., Aug. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER just received I find many articles and letters written for and against our condemned brothers in Freethought, who are now serving out the penalty for what has been adjudged a crime against the laws of our land. It is not my purpose to write in condemnation of either them, the law, or those who sat in judgment to determin them either guilty or innocent. I can see for myself the defects in these writers, and in the law and the judges that sentenced them; but as I am chockful of charity for all, I wish to giv my view of the situation of affairs in general, and ask that all those who see things in a different light from what I do, will extend the same charity of feelings to me. I take the ground that each and all are creatures of circumstances, entirely, and just what we are from inherent qualities, parental teachings, scholastic education, experience, thoughts that come to us uncalled and without warning, contact with others, etc., these all together being what I term education in its broadest sense. As all of these are different in different individuals, so is each one of us different from any other, yet may be much alike in the main. I write this knowing that many, even of our Freethought associates, will call me crazy, and so I may be; but if so, circumstances hav caused it, for I would not be so of my own good will. It has taken much study and reasoning to open my eyes to this (to me) fact. A brother interposes and says, "Why, are you a machine, to grind by others turning?" I answer, "Yes, if they can turn me, I am just such a machine." But the point is, they must produce better argument and reasoning than what I now possess, or they will fall to turn the machine. I hav been grinding different kinds of grists ever since I can remember. When a child I ground corn cob and all to feed an orthodox God who lived up in the sky. As I grew older I fed the same God, but higher up in the planets millions of miles away. I then ground shelled corn in an astronomical mill, and as geology, the different branches of mathematics, etc., improved my intellect, I was able to grind better feed, until I am now trying to use the roller process to grind the finest of flour, to serve to the highest god that my advanced thoughts can imagin; for I hav long since lost sight of the old two-by-four orthodox God in the lower sky, and am searching for one in the eternal laws of nature—one of purity, charitable in the extreme, honest in every particular; one that will giv to every child of creation all that it is possible for him to obtain from the circumstances of his control. I fail to find a God of omniscience or omnipotence, for I see God has done and is doing everything by natural laws and forces, and while so doing cannot make us happy without a counteracting sorrow—cannot giv a rose without a thorn, a day without night, etc.—but is doing the very best he can under the circumstances that control him.

So with man. I am an American, because I was born in America. If born in Ireland, I should hav been an Irishman, with all the brogue, the mother-wit, the love for my mother country, the hatred for "old England;" and if born of Catholic parents, I should probably hav been a Catholic with a desire to kiss the pope's great toe. If I had had Indians for parents, I should hav been a pappoose when young and now a great big buck Indian. But I am just what I am, controled by the forces of desires and restraint, whichever proves the strongest, and if I ever want money badly enough, and the restraining power of respect for myself and my family shall prove too weak to restrain me, I may be found a criminal behind the bars of a felon's cell. Such, however, I hope will not be the case, and to my present mind it looks far off. I might commit suicide, but my desire to liv is much stronger than to die, consequently I am in no danger, unless the conditions of my control are changed by some now unseen circumstances. As this is the case, I am glad I hav lived in an age when we dare think for ourselvs and hav had so many good and great thinkers, with the power of "controled fear," who dared let their thoughts be known, for thus we become educated, and learn to despise the little, mean, low, debased creature that Moses has described as a God, and seek one of greater and nobler attributes, who is at least no lower than man, and as much higher as our feeble minds can imagin.

Thus we find that Messrs. Harman, Heywood, Reid, and company are men of circumstances, who hav by study and a desire to know and think for themselvs, risen above the meaner ones in the lower scale of thought; who hav made no study of actual life, but who by circumstances hav been wafted into a different channel of thought and hav adopted the reform of the law as a profession, and imagin that none but themselvs hav minds of their own, the power or right to think or act for themselvs.

I hav in the same dish of charity enough for those of our Liberal friends who are il-Liberal to all except those who think as they do. In fact, I am so charitable that I can believe every minister, priest, Theist, Atheist, Spiritualist, Materialist, Socialist, Anarchist, and all other honest persons, real men, with the same right to liv and think for themselvs that I hav, and I think just as much of a good man of a different belief or opinion from my own as if he thought as I do. And I would not turn my hand over to convert them to my views, only as I can do so by good argument and by showing them where they are wrong. By such, I giv one turn to their machine and help them grind a different kind of feed, that enables them to taste a diet that suits me so well. We are often told that it will do to talk no free will to children, for they are not responsible for their actions, but men are responsible for every act. If this is true, please tell me just when one leaves childhood for manhood. 'Our law says we are men at twenty-one years of age. Now, how much more do we know the day after we become of age than we did the day before? Is it not a fact that we never become men in the true sense of the word, but are simply older children when fifty than at fifteeen years of age? If this is not true, please say why we do not all know just as much and the same at maturity? Why did not our forefathers know as much as we, and why cannot we know as much as those who will liv after us?

I once joined a certain Society of Agnostic Moralists, but dropped them as soon as I found that they thought themselvs a little more pure and holy than a certain class of people who believe that they hav found evidence of existing spirits, disembodied, and which continue to liv hereafter. Now, I am no Spiritualist (I wish I could see the evidence), but I believe Spiritualists as a class are just as honest and intelligent as I am, and as I wish the right to think and believe for myself I am willing to extend the same right to others.

What we want, in my opinion, is honest men and women who are willing to seek and know the truth and not turn from that which may seem to them absurd until they test the same fully, and even then not condemn others for seeing or thinking what they themselvs hav failed to do. For our thinking or wishing a thing so does not make it true. We need sympathy for the greatest criminals that ever lived; not that we can sanction their doings, but that we may extend the hand of pity to them, for some cause has made them just what they are, and if we must take their life (which I cannot sanction) to keep them from committing more crime and to "educate" others not to follow their examples, let us take it the very easiest way possible, and that not revengefully but with pity and a sense of sorrow that they were so unfortunate as to become criminals to the law of justice. Remember, no one wishes to be a criminal, neither has anyone the least desire to do wrong, but circumstances of temper, want, lust, envy, jealousy, or some one or more of the meaner attributes of man's nature, hav by degrees, or perchance of a sudden, overpowered his better desires and led him to do as he otherwise would not. But I am writing too much, and feel that many of our Liberals and Freethinkers will point the finger of shame toward me, but I must answer: If I hav more charity than thou, my better nature and study hav caused it, and I am not to blame. A. D. SWAN.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Cradles White.

The evening primrose dainty white
Grew on a branching stem,
Within whose four white satin walls
Pale moths had sheltered them;
With fragrant curtains folded round
Each looked a dewy gem.

I counted one in every cup
So like a life-boat small,
While tossed upon the morning breeze
No waxen shell might fall;
The south wind brought a lullaby
And fairy dreams to all.

Get up! get up! you sleepy sprites,
The men are in the corn,
A-plowing down the shining rows
Where song of bees is borne,
And never roses bloomed so fair
As these this summer morn.

Come out and hear the little birds,
These pretty birds of mine,
A-swaying in the willow tree
That bears a creeping vine;
And all the air is filled with song
That makes the morning fine.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD FINCH.

A Vacation Song.

I hav closed my books and hidden my slate,
And thrown my satchel across the gate.
My school is out for a season of rest,
And now for the school-room I love the best.

My school-room lies on the meadow wide,
Where under the clover the sunbeams hide;
Where the long vines cling to the mossy bars,
And the daisies twinkle like fallen stars.

My lessons are written in clouds and trees,
And no one whispers, except the breeze,
Who sometimes blows, from a secret place,
A stray, sweet blossom against my face.

My school bell rings in the rippling stream,
Which hides itself, like a school-boy's dream,
Under a shadow and out of sight,
But laughing still for its own delight.

My school-mates there are the birds and bees,
And the saucy squirrel, less wise than these,
For he only learns in all the weeks
How many chestnuts will fill his cheeks.

Reasoning Faculties of Animals.

DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS: Reasonable principles are all that giv excellence to morality or religion. That forgetfulness of self which makes a patriot better than an ordinary man, is all that dignifies our nature, or, as some will hav it, "raises us above the brute creation"—wait a moment: the devotion of all animals to their young is one proof of the existence of that pity and tenderness which, though so humbly displayed, is the same which in the hearts of the human race lies at the foundation of all true benevolence.

Birds often manifest friendship for each other. A caged robin will hav many a friend to bring its food, offered kindly, with a kind glance and musical chirp.

With regard to business qualities, animals are ingenious and capable. Monkeys can use a lever as well as a man, and elephants hav been seen propping up heavy barrels inclined to fall. I hav often seen dogs fling themselvs forcibly against a gate to open it. Sir John Lubbock saw ants throw grains of sugar from a high place to a party below, who quickly carried them off. Ants, seeming to be intent on business, appear to stop as they meet for a kiss or shake of the hand.

I was present once at an indignation meeting of honey-bees, whose anger was aroused by a mistake of mine. I struck a humble-bee accidentally with a pencil and caused him to fall to the ground, where he lay senseless for a moment.

Instinct is said to be a safe guide for man or angel. But the human race hav the privilege of being conscious of those delicious steps each one of which brings to our senses a new and delightful fragrance from the fields of knowledge. ALHAZA.

The Sacred Lotus.

If you hav ever seen a bright pink pond lily then you know how the sacred lily, or lotus, of Egypt looked. Some one who wrote about this lovely flower many years ago called it the "rose lily."

The flowers of the sacred lotus were offered to their gods by the Egyptians, and its lovely form was painted and carved upon their temples.

They made great use of the lotus flowers at their festivals. Each guest was given a lotus, just as a rosebud is sometimes put in a finger bowl. The walls of the room where the feast was given were decorated with them. Fancy one of our rooms decorated and filled with our lovely white pond lilies, then you can hav some idea of the beauty of these Egyptian festivals.

The lotus was also regarded as a symbol of life by the ancient Egyptians. They sowed its seed by wrapping it in clay, and then throwing it into the water. The beautiful "rose lily," or sacred lotus, is said to grow no longer by the Nile. But it may still be seen carved upon its ancient temples.

It was the people who lived in upper Egypt who took the lotus for their emblem. Those in lower Egypt chose the papyrus—a reed which grows in the valley of the Nile. From its inner bark paper was first made. The lotus is still held as a sacred flower by many eastern nations.—Little Men and Women.

What Are Orchids?

What is an orchid? A plant whose home is in the tropical forests, and yet a plant which is not dependent for its sustenance upon the earth or water in their visible forms. It is a curiosity of the vegetable world, which, perched in the air, sends out its long, searching roots and draws its nourishment from the atmosphere. Ethereal in its nature, so far as this characteristic is concerned, it is very substantial in the valuation which its owners and raisers place upon plants of rare varieties.

According to the Boston Advertiser, experts in this branch of horticulture say that some fine roots are well worth $5,000 each, and some hav been held at even higher figures. Their rarity, the difficulty with which they are propagated, the exquisit delicacy, strange forms, and great variety of blossoms, are the reasons given for these extraordinary values.

Mr. Armour and the Bootblack.

A bootblack walked into the office of Mr. Armour. He had none of his outfit with him, but the bootblack was stamped in his face and all over him. He went to the gate where a guard stands between his post and the greatest packer in the world.

"W'ere's de old man?" asked the urchin.

The guard told the boy to get out.

"You tell de old man dat I want to see him. I want to see him alone. I don't want to bodder you nor de ole man. But I want to see de ole man, an' I want to see him right off."

Mr. Armour at his desk overheard the ragged one's request. "Let that boy come in here," he called to the young man at the gate. There were no preliminary compliments.

"Say," spoke the urchin, "I took a nap out dere in de alley, and w'ile I was asleep some o' dem kids from the board o' trade come along and swiped [stole] my kit an' I'm short. I want ter borrar a dollar to buy me a kit and I'll pay you back on de 'stallment plan. See?"

Mr. Armour handed the boy two silver dollars and told him to go. But the boy handed back one of the dollars and said:

"I doan' want but one. I'm goin' to pay it back, and dere's no use o' a man goin' in deeper'n his head. I allus keep my head above de water."

The truth of the above story is vouched for by one who saw the scene and overheard the conversation.—Chicago Tribune.

The Potato Game.

Select potatoes of average size and oblong rather than round. Place them on the floor about a foot apart in two rows three or four feet apart down the middle of the double parlors. Hav two soup plates at one end, and two silver teaspoons in the hands of the two who are to play the game. Each of the two will begin by taking up the potato farthest from the plate on the teaspoon, using only one hand, and depositing it upon the plate at his end of the row. Then the next potato must be taken up and deposited in like manner, and so on to the last. The one who gathers all his potatoes first has the privilege of choosing his successors in the game.

The fun of the play is in playing it, says the Christian Advocate. It takes some skill to balance a potato on a teaspoon and run ten or fifteen feet as fast as one can without spilling it. Of course the two who plav monopolize the floor, and the rest of the company are wall-flowers, sympathetic onlookers.

The Classified Boy.

"You say," said Mr. Brown to his son Jack, "that Mr. Perkins has a son in your school. How old a boy is he?"

"Oh, he's only a young kid, papa."

"A young kid! About how old is a 'young kid,' now?"

"About six or seven."

"What is a boy after he is done being a 'young kid?'"

"Oh, then he gets to be a 'kid.'"

"What after that?"

"Well, he's a 'kid' until he gets to be about thirteen, and then he's a 'young feller,' if he's pretty big."

"None but good-sized boys can be 'young fellers,' eh?"

"No, sir. Then they stay being young fellers until they're about nineteen, and then they're men."

"Indeed! But how do you class them at the other end of the line? Are they always 'young kids' after they are babies?"

"Oh, no, sir. First they're 'cubs.' They don't get to be 'young kids' until they get out of dresses."

"But when," the father asked, growing more and more curious, "when is a boy supposed to be a 'lad?'"

"We don't hav any lads nowadays, sir. We read about 'em in books, but we don't hav any. I've always wondered about how old a 'lad' was."

"But you hav 'boys,' surely?"

"Oh, yes, sir. They're all boys, of course, until they get to be men. Only these are the different kinds of boys."

Correspondence.

TOURTELOTTE PARK, COL., Aug. 15, 1890.

DEAR AUNT SUSAN: I now take my pen in hand to write another letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER, hoping to find you and the children of our Corner well, as it leaves us well at present. I saw my letter in the paper, and I hope to giv a better description of the Rocky mountains in this letter. We hav no trees here except pine and balsam trees. We hav lots of wild red currants here. We had some strawberries, but they were small. The timber is full of chipmunks and squirrels. We are eleven thousand feet high, and in winter time the air is so light you can hardly catch your breath. We will soon hav snow (next month), and we hav snow in May, so we do not hav much summer. Snow is twenty feet deep in some places in winter time. The flowers are nearly all vanished away. I wrote to Elda S. Billings, but never received an answer. I do not know if she got it or not. The air is so light that cats cannot liv up here. There are only three pigs in the Park. Miss Emma Kraft wrote me a letter; she saw my letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope that I may hear from the boys and girls. I hav no companions here—there are no girls of my age at all. There are a few young girls about twenty-two years of age, so there is no enjoyment here at all, only a few dances every two weeks. School will be out August 22d. We are having very nice weather now, lots of rain, but when snow comes we shall not see rain till next July or August. I hav no pets only a little dog, and its name is Pe Roe. I had two kittens and they died. I had one squirrel but it got out of its cage.

From your friend, RHODA MASON.

FORT RANDALL, S. D., July 26, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav just finished reading your admirable story, "All in a Lifetime." Allow me to express my thanks for the enjoyment your excellent work afforded me. Probably I shall never hav the opportunity to visit the Eastern states, but being somewhat of a savage I hav the audacity to request of you the acceptance of my photograph and ask for it a place in your album, among the Freethinkers of the East.

Whether on a hunting expedition in the Rocky mountains or following on the trail of Geronimo's Apaches through the wilderness of the Sierra Madre mountains in Arizona, whenever the little pack-mule that followed us with mail arrived in our camp and I was so lucky as to perceive a copy of the ever-welcome Investigator, then the hardships of the campaign were all forgotten for the time being. Eagerly I skirmished through its columns for articles from my three favorit writers, i.e., our late friend Seaver, Miss Wixon, and Otto Wettstein.

About eighteen months ago, I left Arizona and came as far east as Kansas City, Mo., but missed to go on a visit to Rochelle, Ill., and I fear Otto Wettstein will never forgiv me. I collected many specimens, especially among the larger mammals and numerous birds, ethnological specimens, etc., for the National Museum in Washington, D. C., during very nearly fifteen years of my vagabond soldier life on the Western frontier.

The young eagle you see on the picture, I shot last summer, near Fort Assinniboine, Montana. The mounting of the bird is not as perfect as it should hav been, on account of insufficient time to perform the work properly; we had at that time in Fort Assinniboine a regular typhoid fever epidemic and I was kept real busy almost night and day.

I remain, Yours truly, CHAS. RUBY.

News of the Week.

THE city of Perugia, Italy, has been injured by a tornado, which blew down four churches.

IN a late criminal trial at Paris a priest was fined for refusing to testify what a person had confessed to him.

ST. PATRICK'S cathedral, New York, will hav the heaviest chime of bells in the country, weighing 30,000 pounds, and costing $15,000.

THE religious cant with which Stanley larded his book has borne fruit in competition of churches to secure him to lecture as an evangelical sensation.

CHILI, the richest and most prosperous of the South American republics, is going to the dogs on account of spiteful quarrels among its leaders and tumults of its ignorant masses.

THE time fixed by some observers for a European war is 1892, when Russia will hav completed the rehabilitation of her army in which she is engaged, and be ready to attack Germany or England.

THE youngest murderer on record is John Noakes, of Stoke-on-Trent, Eng., four and one-half years old. He has pushed three children into the river at different occasions, the last one being drowned.

TRINITY church corporation, which owns $145,000,000 worth of untaxed property on Manhattan island, is making a fierce fight over having to sell an old churchyard to the city, which asks it to create a breathing-space for a crowded tenement.

THE indignation of all civilized persons continues to increase at the edict against the Jews framed by the czar and his Orthodox church. The barbarity of this legislation has been unparalleled in European history since the revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

REPRESENTATIV QUINN has moved in the national House of Representativs that the committee on the judiciary inquire what legislation within the province of the federal government may be proper and necessary to prevent corporations engaged in interstate commerce traffic from employing Pinkerton men.

A SOCIALISTIC conspiracy has been discovered at Rome. Bombs charged with powder and dynamite hav been found concealed in the houses of workmen belonging to secret societies. Correspondence with foreign Socialists of a dangerous character and republican flags to be displayed in case of an outbreak hav been seized.

JEWS hav been returning to the Holy Land in considerable numbers, and now that they must leave Russia the influx into Palestine will increase. The return of the fertilizing rains, said to hav been withheld since the Babylonish captivity, is taken as another sign of the revival of the Israelitish kingdom. Re-nationalization of the Jews will fortify their religious faith, but deal a sad blow to the Christians' custom of citing the dispersion of the race that crucified their savior.

AN odd controversy involving religion is in progress in North Plainfield, N. J. The Hebrew population eat no meat except that killed and sold to them under direction of their rabbi. The Jewish pastor patronizes the slaughter-house of Nicholas Gisser, and accompanies Gisser about town dealing out meat daily to the Hebrews. They hav been notified not to peddle meat without the usual license, but refuse to pay it and declare that they will continue in their former course, protesting against what they term an infringement on their civil and religious liberty.

THERE is trouble between the Protestant and Romanist parties of Uganda who recently had to combine against the Mohammedans to seat their Christian king Mwanga on the throne. Before they combined to reinstate Mwanga each side took an oath that in the event of its securing the chief authority under the king, it would not molest the other party. In consequence of this compact, though there is much bad feeling, no open acts of hostility hav occurred between the parties. The Romanists, who are numerically stronger than their rivals, hav the ear of the king, and hold the best places in the government.

THE Mississippi constitutional convention is devoting nearly its whole session to inventing some scheme to secure white supremacy. It was prevented from adopting educational qualifications by the act under which the state was re-admitted to the Union. By the terms of that act the constitution of 1868 shall not be changed so as to deprive any citizen or class of citizens of the right to vote as secured by that constitution, which provides that "no property or educational qualification shall ever be required." The next device was an evasion of this regulation, in the form of a "plural vote" system. Though no one was to be denied a vote, those owning a certain amount of property were to hav an additional vote. But it was feared that this device could not escape the above prohibition of property qualification, and the convention is falling back on a change of the basis of representation from electors to counties.

TRY-SQUARE:
OR,
The Church of Practical Religion.
BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

LOOKING BACKWARD

By Edward Bellamy,

Author of "Dr. Heidenhoff's Process," etc.

It is a thought-breeding book, and all who are free to receive new light will find in it satisfaction and inspiration.—[New York Tribune.

The appeal is always made to a man's reason, and to his noblest sentiments: never to his selfishness.—[Boston Post.

A suggestion of a really practicable and feasible social state greatly in advance of the present. The romantic narrativ is rich in its forecast of actual possibilities.—[Boston Traveler.

A COMPENDIUM OF UNIVERSAL HISTORY.
By WINWOOD READE.

It is really a remarkable book, in which universal history is "boiled down" with surprising skill.—[Literary World.

You turn over his pages with a fascination similar to that experienced in reading Washington Irving.—[Inter-Ocean.

His history has a continuity, a rush, a carrying power, which reminds us strikingly of Gibbon.—[New Haven Palladium.

The sketch of early Egyptian history, in the first chapter, is a masterpiece of historical writing. He has a style that reminds us of Macaulay.—[Penn Monthly.

DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indiscretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT.

"Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address,

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N. J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second, that he fulfills all his agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would hav been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S "Children's Corner," MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, has been elected senior member of the School Board of Fall River, Mass.

The Truth Seeker Gives all the News of Freethought, and is Always on Guard Against the Encroachments of Ecclesiastics upon the People's Liberties.

If you have any Ideas or Reforms calculated to benefit humanity write to THE TRUTH SEEKER (sending your subscription) and let the world know of them. THE TRUTH SEEKER publishes each week more letters from the people than any other paper in the world.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is devoted to the defense of Mental Liberty, of American Institutions, and the Preservation of the United States Constitution, so far as regards religious tests, and the maintenance of human rights. It advocates the abolition of all laws based on religion or religious observances. It demands the taxation of church property. It is uncompromisingly opposed to anything tending toward a union of church and state, either in name or in fact.

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

WHO rules Quebec? Mercier. Who rules Mercier? Tachereau. Who rules Tachereau? Leo XIII. Who rules Leo XIII.? The general of the Jesuits. Does this apply to many parts of the United States? If so, how do you like it, Americans?—Loyal American.

THE Congregationalist publishes an account of a traveling salesman who declared that in traveling over six thousand miles he had been asked to drink probably more than that number of times, but not once had he been asked to go to church.

A MEMBER of a certain fashionable New York church, who spoke of her pastor irreverently as "the apostle to the genteels," remarked once after a particularly doctrinal sermon, that if Dr. Blank preached restitution instead of repentance he would preach to empty pews.

A PYTHONESS in Wichita announces that November 19th will be positivly the last appearance of this wicked but rather entertaining world. The Sun thinks the Kansas prophetess might hav let the old thing last until the Friday after Thanksgiving, and is inclined to think it will, anyway.

THE London Freethinker reports that the Belgian Freethinkers hav, under Dr. Cesar de Paepe, organized a corps of lay nurses for hospitals to prevent the often unwished-for ministration of Catholic nuns. They now claim that there is no just reason against the complete secularization of hospitals and infirmaries.

THE funniest thing in periodical literature, lately, according to the Catholic Review, was a comparison of Cardinal Gibbons's last book with the work of a German Rationalist. It was from the pen of a professor and appeared in the Christian Union. The most suggestiv paragraph was: "Looking through the eyes of this German professor, Jesus appears as a man; looking through the eyes of the archbishop, he appears as God. Neither the one nor the other looks upon him as a divine man. It seems to us that the Roman Catholic is as far from the simple teaching of the gospel as is the Rationalist."

"MAX O'RELL" asks: "Why are the bulk of French marriages far happier than the bulk of English ones? In my opinion, it is simply because. according to the French system, a man has to win the affection of his wife after the wedding. The French married couple begin at the first act, whereas the English one has generally got through all but the fifth by the time the wedding bells hav stopped ringing. Then in come the prosaic cares of life and cover everything up. Out go the lights, and, presto! the glamour is gone, too, and nothing remains of it all but a sleepy numbness and a sort of wonder that the comedy should enjoy such a world-wide reputation. Yes, in matrimony there is a way of eating your cake and yet having it; but you must not take your bits too large in the beginning. As a clever wit says: 'When you are dead, it is for a long time; but when you are married, it is forever.'"

SPEAKING of the statue of Voltaire, a French paper has unearthed a letter of his upon precisely that subject, addressed to a friend, and here is the lesson which the philosopher givs: "Enjoy life while you can, despise all the rest. I think I hav already told you that I am not the dignusque numismate vultus. I am no longer the possessor of what might be called a face. I look like a baked apple on the top of a crane's neck. It would never do to carve on that. Some little time ago the duchess of Brunswick begged so hard of the king of Prussia to send her his statue, made after the fashion of Louis XIV. in the Place des Victoires, that his majesty was unable to refuse her. He got himself sculptured in this fashion, astride on a turkey cock, and instead of four slaves around the base there were four monkeys grinning. You will admit that after all it ill becomes small folks to be vain. But if you wish, I will send you one of the monkeys of that statue, and you can put my name at the foot of it. My dear sir, let us esteem only health and repose. All the rest is smoke, and I hav already spent too much of my life in running after smoke. I wish you a genuin happiness, if there is such a thing."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Voice, the Prohibition organ, in Lexington, Neb., thinks that paper is treading on dangerous ground when it makes an exception, in prohibitory laws, of wines used for "sacramental" purposes. He does not see "how any Christian Prohibitionist can propose or advocate alcoholic liquor for sacramental purposes." The editor replies: "We do not advocate it. We simply say that it is not the province of legislators to decide whether or not the sacramental wine should be fermented. A law which prohibited the manufacture of fermented wines for sacramental purposes would go beyond the proper province of law and cause many sincere Christians either to violate the law or to violate what they believe to be the injunction of Christ. There is no necessity for that." Didn't Christ say something about woe to come to pharisees and hypocrits?

OUR legislators can always be relied upon to make smooth the path of the pious. Before the contract labor law was passed in the House, Saturday, an amendment was proposed exempting from its provisions ministers of the gospel. This curious legislation, as the Indianapolis Journal calls it, was necessitated by a decision of the treasury department that clergymen who were called from foreign countries to occupy pulpits in the United States were to be considered under the law as contract laborers. Several instances hav occurred in which churches in the United States hav been prohibited from securing pastors of foreign birth. One peculiar case occurred on the line between Michigan and Canada. The congregation on this side of the boundary invited a pastor in a village on the opposit side to come over and fill their pulpit. Some mischief-makers wrote a letter to the secretary of the treasury, calling his attention to the fact, and the department was compelled to issue an order prohibiting the engagement of this pastor. But in case the Senate concurs in the action of the House Saturday, clergymen will be exempt from the provisions of the act.

THE Russian ministry has accorded to the district assemblies of the government of Ekaterinoslov permission to open bookstores in all the villages in which there may be a demand for reading matter, under the condition that no other publications be kept for sale than such as the secular and the religious censors may approve. But the Grazhdanin, a daily paper of St. Petersburg, takes exceptions to that measure. "It is unwise," says that paper, "to put dangerous weapons in the hands of the people. Bookstores once opened for the common people will in a short time be turned by the Liberals into weapons against the government, and the disintegration of the national spirit will be wrought. Of course no other books but such as the censor approves are desired at present. The people need at first only stories of Russian heroes and patriot warriors. But in a short time they will begin reading the editorials of newspapers and get into the habit of reasoning about current events. Then they will become acquainted with Mill, Lassalle, and other writers of the kind. Within five or six years the Liberalistic propaganda will find means to distribute among them books and papers of the most dangerous tendencies."

THE correspondent of an Eastern paper writes from New York: "I was exceedingly sorry to hear that there was a serious difficulty between Deacon Wood, the treasurer of Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle, and the sculptors who prepared the life-sized effigies of the reverend doctor, which were to be used as prizes for the purpose of swelling the Tabernacle building fund. It appears that there was not such an activ demand for them as the church building committee anticipated. Out of fifty prepared, forty-nine remained on their hands, the fiftieth being in the pastor's back parlor. Deacon Wood bases his refusal to accept them on the ground that the mouth is too large. This is certainly a valid objection and one that admits of neither apology nor excuse. The man who calls himself an artist, and who could deliberately and in cold blood sit down and enlarge Doctor Talmage's mouth, was guilty of an offense for which no ordinary punishment is adequate. Meanwhile, whoever gets a prize will hav to take him mouth and all, just as he is, or not at all, and the question of what to do with the forty-nine busts, the building committee now hav under prayerful consideration."

THIS is from the Catholic Review: "The account given in last week's paper of the House of Refuge ought to make the Catholics of this city blush for themselvs, but we fear it will not cause them a moment's careless thought. In a city which is half Catholic, whose chief officer is a Catholic, a handful of bigots are allowed to destroy the faith of Catholic children at leisure with scarcely a protest from the millions of Catholics in the city. This is lamentable. The officers and trustees of the House of Refuge should be at least one-half Catholic. It should be managed entirely from the Catholic standpoint, which would abolish the thing called nonsectarianism, and allow the children to receive the religious training of their parents. The suggestion that the corporate body now ruling the House of Refuge be abolished and its officers be appointed by the governor is a good one, and it can be carried out if the Catholic voters of New York and other cities in the state so determin. Of course the Evangelical Alliance will be stirred up, but as it is time for that eminent body to receive a sound drubbing it will be no obstacle." The Review ought to patent its remedy for sectarian troubles.

THE Christian Globe, of England, has but a poor opinion of "society Christians," whose religion "consists principally in a more or less scrupulous observance of the outward forms of religion, and in a careful avoidance of all religious subjects in conversation, and of all religious principles in daily life." It proceeds: "They say they are Christians, and would be insulted if you denied their right to the title; but never in their whole lives hav they given ten minutes' thought to religious subjects. They are nominally Christians, because it is good form so to be, just as they would be Mohammedans or Mumbo-Jumbo worshipers if such were the fashion. To them Christianity is a name; its reality never reaches them. Were some one to tell them what the religion of Christ really is, they would be astounded and incredulous, and would probably consider their informant a maniac—certainly a bore. The fact of the whole matter is that religion is for men only a sustaining power, and these society trifiers are not men. They are poor creatures blighted in their growth, who hav not come, and never will come, to maturity. They are unfinished, incomplete, and doomed to liv a life which is no life. They are more unfortunate than the physically deformed. They can hardly be called human butterflies, for they are neither harmless nor pretty."

To the Antipoverty Society Dr. McGlynn said last Sunday night: "Don't believe there is not a union of church and state. It's well known that favors are exchanged between churches and politicians. You help us and we'll help you. Dear brethren, hadn't you better try and make it no longer a matter of interest on either side to wink at the corruptions on the other side? Now, the church winks at the corruptions of politics in order to get the money from the public treasury into the churches' tills. There are millions of dollars distributed to charitable institutions, and the people of New York don't know anything about how it is done. Persons in power can make it profitable to institutions to cultivate their acquaintance. One of the reasons why one of the old political parties is so intrenched in power, is because the clergy are in favor of political corruption. We all know the proper time to hold church fairs is a month or so before election. A candidate for judge can lay a $10 note on a table at a booth, and he believes he can get votes for it. Not long ago a pastor announced from his pulpit: 'Mr. So-and-so [a gambler] visited our fair. Another Mr. So-and-so hasn't, and we hope he will behave as handsomely as did his opponent.' Let the clergymen purify church politics, I say, before they try their hand outside their parishes. Tammany Hall in Tweed's time was kept in power by the clergy, but of course the clergy didn't know it then. They were fooled by the leaders of the gang. Then there are the sham parochial schools, which some people hav been getting up while turning a deaf ear to children crying for the bread of life. If the text is to be, 'If ye did it not to the least of these, ye did it not to me,' there will be ecclesiastics who will find it as difficult to get into heaven as the rich man in scripture. I've opened a vast field of inquiry for the brethren. Now I suppose they won't ask me to join them."

THIS is the way the Denison, Tex., Sunday Gazetteer announces the opening of a revival: "Burnett & Mulkey are billed to exhibit with their monster unified gospel aggregation at Greenville this week, and the papers of that city are full of advance notices of the coming attraction. We hav seen this show ourselvs, and can conscientiously indorse its entire olio of features. Mr. Mulkey, who cleans the gasoline torches, does the ushering and calls the acts in the big show, and does the eccentric comedy in the concert, is a thorough artist in his line, and acquits himself in a manner that would be creditable to any amusement enterprise. His startling equestrian acts in the large pavilion are also features of merit, while his great menage act with the famous studs (Belzebub, Trinne Deity, Hell Fire, Eternal Punishment, Predestination, Faith, Saving Grace, and Total Depravity) from the stables of the early fathers, is probably unsurpassed among the best performances of tented gospel exhibitions. These battle-scarred chargers are a good deal run down just now, it is true, and are afflicted to some extent with spavin and ringbone and heaves and botts and blind staggers, but by dint of feeding branmash and antimony, and using a carpet tack under the center girth, Mr. Mulkey succeeds in bringing them on with a lively spurt, and puts them around the hippodrome track at a quite good hickory. Mr. Mulkey also carries a large grip filled with the latest gags that are to be had out of almanacs, and makes local application of them in a manner that is inimitable. To this brilliant olio he has recently added a topical song entitled, 'We're Very Wide Awake, Jehove and I,' on which he is said to receive a recall at each performance. Mr. Burnett is the slugger of the combination, and when he puts on the gloves and comes crawling under the ropes the practiced observer may notice Satan take up another hole in his belt and turn to his trainer for an alcohol sponge bath to hide his growing pallor. Time is called, and the belted bruiser of the Plutonion Athletic Club faces the music like a little man, but he is no match for the gospel heavy-weight, and goes down with a swimming sensation in his head and his teeth full of four-ounce boxing-glove. Again and again he rises at the call of 'time,' falls to avoid punishment, hugs the ropes and fights for wind, but all in vain. Right and left he is knocked by the strong arm of faith, until a terrific left-hander lands upon his neck with a sickening thud and he goes down in a heap at the foot of the grand stand, while the band plays 'Annie Laurie.' No. Anyone who says Burnett & Mulkey giv a bum show speaks ignorantly or with malice aforethought. They do no such thing.

The Christian's India Rubber God.

Oh, horror! oh, shame! rank Atheism, downright blasphemy, to call the creator of the heaven and the earth an India rubber God!

Such will be the exclamations of most Christians who read the title of this article. But let me appeal to their reason, if they hav any.

What but India rubber can be stretched out, shrunk up, expanded, contracted, squeezed, and shaped to suit any absurdity, and coincide with any phase of religious belief, and to fit every theological wrinkle?

Think of a God that can be expanded to fill the immensity of space, and then shrunk up so as to be around on this little earth and carve a rib out of old Adam. A God who fills the interstellar spaces, and existed from all eternity, being born of woman and trotted on a mother's knee, wandering around the country of Palestine, and then nailed to a tree. Why, if he filled the immensity of space, what kind of trees must grow in Palestine! The tallest kind of a redwood would be a mere twig in comparison. A God that fashioned a mighty globe like the sun getting down to a little insect so small that five hundred thousand of them can find ample room in a drop of water, yet each complete in all its parts. A God that presides over the destiny of unnumbered worlds wrestling with a man till daybreak. A God that existed from all eternity and can never cease to exist, who was killed and remained dead for three days. A God before whose majesty all nations should bow exhibiting his back parts to a man among the rocks. It is no wonder that a belief in such an India rubber God should make India rubber Christians.

This India rubber God has to be shrunk and stretched, squeezed and fashioned, to suit the Christian's belief, and then the facts of science hav to be stretched or shrunk to correspond with the rubber God.

Some years ago a Christian minister put Nelson's "Cause and Cure of Infidelity" into my hand, and told me that he believed me to be honest, and that if I would read the book, a new light would break upon my vision, and I would see things differently from what I ever had before. The book was begun with high hopes and ended in disgust.

Later on a lawyer called my attention to "The Six Days of Creation," with the assurance that the author, one of the most learned men in all the world, had spent six years on the work. This lawyer having sat in the councils of the great Empire state, I had reason to believe that the work must be one of high merit.

I began with the introduction with the intention of giving the work the closest perusal. On the second page I found this outburst of Christian wisdom: "Whatever science may declare, or whatever new discoveries may be made, everything must be construed so as to harmonize with the word of God." Well, I lost my patience, and had no desire to wade through the sea of a "fool's folly."

A short time ago my attention was called to "Science and the Bible," quite a large work, written by the Rev. Herbert W. Morris, A.M.

I was told that this work would remove all doubt from the minds of the most skeptical; that it literally tore the heart out of Infidelity, and was unanswerable.

Goodyear, the great India rubber man, is nowhere. The Rev. Herbert W. Morris, A.M., has left all competitors far behind, and stands before the world as the boss rubber manipulator.

According to this erudite author, there was a time when there were no earth, sun, moon, or stars, or matter out of which to make them. For he says that "they were not created out of preëxisting matter, but out of nothing."

Epicurus said, "Know first of all that nothing can spring from nonentity," and he told the truth, all the Bibles to the contrary notwithstanding.

If God did create—bring out of nothing—the earth and all the sidereal hosts, why did he not tell us in his great palaver-book how something can be made out of nothing?

It would not hav taken any longer than it did to tell about an old woman turning to salt, and the information would hav been worth a thousand times more.

From all eternity up to about six thousand years ago God did nothing but fill space.

This shows the expansion of the rubber.

After loafing around in space for untold millions of years, something put it into his head to make a world.

He had nothing to make a world out of, so he made it out of nothing—so says Rev. Mr. Morris, the great harmonizer, and that is enough to satisfy a Christian.

I expect he rolled up a great mountain of nothing, and put it onto an almighty great table, and rolled it out thin with an almighty great rolling-pin, as a woman would a shortcake. Then he got another great mountain of nothing and wrapped it up in the covering, after the manner of an apple-dumpling. Then he rolled it about on the table until it was round, and there was a world. Christians used to think that he just rolled the nothing out flat and left it, but later discoverers show that he put in the filling and rolled it into shape, and got a first-rate job.

The sun, planets, and stars were all created with reference to this earth, and the earth was created only to become the abode of man. "And God set them in the firmament of the heaven to giv light upon the earth. And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to giv light on the earth" (Bible).

But the earth, sun, moon, and stars were only a secondary consideration, for God constantly kept his eye on man as the ultimatum, and designed everything which he created for him. "All that we hav thus far surveyed," says the great harmonizer, "has been fitted up for an expected occupant"—man. The meaning of this language, if it hav any meaning at all, is that the sun, moon, and stars (the planets left out, because at that time they could not be distinguished from the stars), and everything on this earth was "arranged and contrived" for man.

It is evident that the author of Genesis, whoever he may hav been, had no conception of space, had no idea that our earth belonged to a great family of worlds, but believed it to be flat and of more consequence than all else his eyes beheld.

It is a curious fact that the moon, only about two thousand miles in diameter, should be so conspicuously noticed, when no mention is made of Jupiter with its moons, Saturn with its rings, or Uranus or Neptune, which are so many times greater.

It is evident that old Moses knew nothing about the planets. So God did not mention them. He looked up into the heavens with the gaze of a savage and saw the stars as so many points of light, and, compared with the apparent brightness of the sun and moon, thought them of little value, and so a simple mention of them was sufficient—"he made the stars also." The author of Genesis had no more idea of the magnitude and distance of the "stars," and the relation of the earth to a grand system of worlds, than a nativ Australian. And the idea that a God of all wisdom dictated the account of the creation as given in Genesis, is as silly as it would be for a man to attempt to write a history of the United States, and make mention of Rhode Island and Connecticut and some important towns, and leave out all the other states and great cities.

If Moses had possessed even a superficial knowledge of the solar system and the sidereal heavens, he would not hav represented the little ball of earth on which we dwell as the most conspicuous object in creation and of more importance than other rolling worlds million of times larger.

The sun, fourteen hundred thousand times larger than the earth, is represented as a mere attendant on the earth, and created especially for its accommodation. And then our little moon, a mere dot in creation, is next in importance. To say that the planets and sun and all the sidereal hosts are mere attachments to the earth involves as great an absurdity as to say the team and the load are only an attachment to the dog under the wagon. Does such an arrangement show adaptation of means to ends? We overlook many mistakes in an apprentice, but for an old boss God to get the cart before the horse, as he does when he makes a vast globe like the sun for the accommodation of the earth, shows that he never ought to hav engaged in business on his own hook.

Let us mount a step higher and find out approximately how big God is. God fills the immensity of space, but who can comprehend that which is without limit? It is like a savage standing upon an island and trying to form an idea of the extent of the ocean when the horizon bounds his vision on every side.

We will take the computed distance of Sirius, one hundred and twenty trillions of miles, as a unit of measure, and represent this distance by a rod projected from the sun in any direction. At the end of this rod we will place another and another, until millions of these rods shall be placed end to end on a line and pointing in the same direction. Let these lines of rods be multiplied until they point from the sun in every direction.

What imagination is fertil enough to comprehend such a sphere as would be described by the outer ends of these rods? And yet such a sphere would only be an infinitesimal core taken out of space. Let these spheres be multiplied in the mind until they equal the sands of the sea for number, and then only a single dip has been taken from the ocean of space.

Now do you begin to understand how big God is? He fills all of this space. How did old Jacob ever work his courage up to the sticking-point to wrestle with such a God? No wonder he came out of the contest with a broken thigh. Then, think of his exhibition to Moses among the rocks. Shades of Herschel! he must hav been blessed with telescopic vision to see even his "back parts."

"With God all things are possible." And since "in six days he created the heavens and the earth," and since it is so hard to get a definit idea of space, I wonder why he did not put in another day and wall it in.

The cardinal idea obtained from the Mosaic account of creation is, that this earth was the central object in God's mind during his six days' labor. That the sun, moon, and stars were mere appendages upon which was bestowed but little thought or labor. That the earth occupied most of his thought and time and was the chief object of his solicitude, and that man was the creature for whose benefit and accommodation the whole work was performed.

Rev. Mr. Morris, who sees nothing but harmony between science and the Bible, says, "The world with its furniture was contrived and arranged with manifest reference to his [man's] wants and conveniences." A little knowledge of astronomy will show how childish both the statements in Genesis and the above statement of Morris's are.

Whenever I enter the field of astronomy and think of the giants who hav gone before, and made it possible for me to know something about its mighty truths, I feel my littleness and "step with trembling tread."

But let us test the truth of these statements by the standard of reason, the only standard known to science.

Moses in his ignorance thought or knew but little about the stars. But they hav engaged the attention of men of the deepest scientific attainment for hundreds of years. While the distance of the sun and even the far-off planets had been accurately measured, the stars in their dazzling beauty seemed to laugh at man's effort, and bid defiance to every attempt to fathom their distances. Long did he watch and wait and experiment without result. On the 1st of January, say, the position of a star, one supposed to be among the nearest, was accurately ascertained. Then waiting for six months until the earth had swung around to the opposit part of its orbit, another observation was taken. Although this gave a base line of the diameter of the earth's orbit, or nearly one hundred and ninety millions of miles, yet there was no displacement. The star appeared to be precisely in the same point in the heavens that it occupied six months before. This experiment yielded only a negativ result. While the distance of the star could not be ascertained, it showed that in comparison to the distance of that star the base line was a mere point. That star was dropped and another taken, and another and another, with the same result.

Disappointed but never discouraged, the effort was continued until a star was found which showed displacement. A star had been found near enough to the earth to render the longest base line that could be obtained available. The mighty chasm had been spanned; man had triumphed; the star depths had been sounded.

Since that time the distances of many of the fixed stars hav been meaeured. And how shall we express the distances of these our nearest neighbors? Light, which travels at the rate of nearly two hundred thousand miles per second, is nearly four years in reaching us from one of the nearest stars. There are stars so far distant that light would be hundreds and thousands of years in reaching us.

The stars are not scattered promiscuously through the heavens as they probably appeared to the untutored gaze of Moses, but they are arranged in groups and clusters of many millions each.

All of the stars seen with the naked eye and most stars seen with telescopes of ordinary power, are arranged in the cluster to which our sun belongs. Many of these stars which appear single to the naked eye are double when seen through a telescope. In some instances these stars mutually revolve around each other. In others one revolves around the other as a center.

Our sun is revolving around a distant star as a center. Doubtless from a far-off star these two stars would appear single.

Many who look into the Milky Way will be astonished to know that this bright archway which spans the heavens is composed entirely of stars so thickly set that they cannot be seen separately, but whose mingled light produces the milky appearance which we observe.

Herschel estimated that in the densest part of the Milky Way five hundred stars were ranged one behind the other, and separated by a distance equal to that which separates us from other stars.

It takes seventy years for light to travel from the star Capella to the earth. Assuming this as a medium distance between the stars, and that there are five hundred stars one behind the other in a right line in the Milky Way, then it must take light to travel from the innermost star to the outermost five hundred times seventy, or thirty-five thousand years.

A Conversation.

Cleric: Hav you made your peace with God, my brother?

Skeptic: I don't know that I ever had a quarrel with him.

Cleric: But you must know that by nature you are a child of the devil, and at enmity with God.

Skeptic: I don't know anything of the kind. I am a child of nature—the result of an infinit series of causes. If I am at enmity with God it is no fault of mine. I don't wish to offend him or anybody else.

Cleric: I am afraid you don't realize your true position. The holy scriptures distinctly tell us that the heart of man is above all things desperately wicked.

Skeptic: I hav read many worse things than that in the "holy scriptures," but I believe they are false. Some men are wicked, but millions are good, honest, and true. The majority of men do not sin willfully. Ignorance is the mother of crime. The schoolmaster is abroad and I hav hopes that under a more scientific training future generations will hav "sweeter manners and purer laws."

Cleric: Yes, but what good is education without the love of Jesus Christ shed abroad in the heart?

Skeptic: I don't know what the love of Jesus Christ is. Love is a sentiment born of intimate association. It is a union of lives.

Cleric: Just so; you express exactly the terms upon which men should liv with Christ.

Skeptic: Some men say they can. As for me Christ is merely a historical question. It interests me just as Buddha, Osiris, Moses, or any other imaginary character does. I can respect a man for his life's work or revere his memory, but I cannot love him unless I knew him.

Cleric: But can't we love a man for what he has done for us? Can't we love Christ for laying down his own life for us?

Skeptic: Such a man certainly would deserve our love, but no man would do it unless he had been "intimately associated" with us. Christ could not hav died for me even though he died for all who had lived and who were living at the time of his death. He is said to hav died about nineteen hundred years ago. I had done no sin unless I had sinned before I was born. He died too soon for me. If I am to be any gainer by such a sad event it must be performed again. I don't want such tragedies, but if they are to be effectual they should be acted every generation say of thirty years.

Cleric: Oh, my friend; time does not count with God. He is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

Skeptic: I don't know how God reckons time. Men measure it. Nobody can suffer on account of what may happen one hundred years hence.

Cleric: But don't you see that the laws of God hav been violated by our first parents, and that God, as the moral governor of the universe, must hav his justice satisfied? He can pardon, but only when the object of his mercy has complied with the conditions.

Skeptic: I only know a very little of the laws of nature; perhaps they are the same as the laws of God. These laws are often violated. Suffering in some form inevitably follows. There is no forgivness. Fire burns, water drowns, nature makes no allowance for ignorance. Ignorance is a capital offense. Every act is followed by consequences. If our "fust parents" sinned, they suffered. As to a moral governor I know nothing. Morality is a social question and is independent of all governors or governments. It grows. If God is just I don't see why anybody should undertake to do his business. I am inclined to the opinion that it is just because you doubt his justice that you are so solicitous for me to effect a compromise with him.

Cleric: Not at all. There is no compromising with God. He offers a full pardon on certain conditions.

Skeptic: Yes; but suppose I don't want the pardon, and suppose I object to the conditions? If God likes to make an agreement with Christ on a matter in which I am closely interested, must I fall in with the arrangement without being consulted?

Cleric: Surely you don't doubt the wisdom of God? The plan of salvation is so simple that a child can understand it.

Skeptic: Then why do you build your colleges, and elect your professors to teach the "truth" and to make "manifest the things of God?" You mean perhaps that anybody can talk about this plan of salvation. Now, after all this, what is the "plan of salvation?"

Cleric: The redemption of men, from the condemnation of God, by the blood of Christ, shed on Calvary.

Skeptic: You mean that the murder of Christ nineteen hundred years ago was a plan of God for saving mankind from hell?

Cleric: I could not call it murder. "It pleased the Lord to bruise him."

Skeptic: But if you or I had done it, should we not hav been murderers?

Cleric: Undoubtedly; but, "My ways are not your ways, saith the Lord." We cannot see through the ways of the Lord. You seem to forget that if all these things were reducible to demonstration and proof there would be no room for the exercise of faith. By faith ye are saved, says the apostle Paul.

Skeptic: You mean to say that unless this theory is accepted in faith by mankind, it is of no avail.

Cleric: I do. God offers it to you. If you don't accept then the consequences be on your own head.

Skeptic: I see. Christ satisfied the justice, paid the price of my ransom, canceled the debt which he thought I owed God, and yet God wants something more from me, and if I refuse Christ died in vain.

Cleric: Yes.

Skeptic: So then we hav reduced the Christian religion to a scheme which occupied the divine mind for eternity, and which can be made abortiv by man's rejection of it. What a scheme! HENRY ROWLEY.

Russia: An Ode.

[The following poem was the cause of an interpellation of the under-secretary of state for foreign affairs in the English House of Commons. One of the members wished to be informed whether this poem might not lead to unpleasant complications with Russia, and if Mr. Swinburne should not be restrained from such utterances. The under-secretary replied that he did not think Great Britain and Russia together could restrain Mr. Swinburne's outpourings.]

Out of hell a word comes hissing, dark as doom,
Fierce as fire, and foul as plague-polluted gloom;
Out of hell wherein the sinless damned endure
More than ever sin conceived of pains impure;
More than ever ground men's living souls to dust;
Worse than madness ever dreamed of murderous lust.
Since the world's wail first went up from lands and seas
Ears hav heard not, tongues hav told not things like these.
Dante, led by love's and hate's accordant spell
Down the deepest and the loathliest ways of hell,
Where beyond the brook of blood the rain was fire,
Where the scalps were masked with dung more deep than mire,
Saw not, where the filth was foulest, and the night
Darkest, depths whose fiends could match the Muscovite.
Set beside this truth, his deadliest vision seems
Pale and pure and painless as a virgin's dreams.
Maidens dead beneath the clasping lash, and wives
Rent with deadlier pangs than death—for shame survives,
Naked, mad, starved, scourged, spurned, frozen, fallen, deflowered,
Souls and bodies as by fangs of beasts devoured,
Sounds that hell would hear not, sighs no thoughts could shape,
Limbs that feel as flame the ravenous grasp of rape,
Filth of raging crime and shame that crime enjoys,
Age made one with youth in torture, girls with boys,
These, and worse, if aught be worse than these things are,
Prove thee regent, Russia—praise thy mercy, czar.

Sons of man, men born of women, may we dare
Say they sin who dare be slain and dare not spare?
They who take their lives in hand and smile on death,
Holding life as less than sleep's most fitful breath,
So their life perchance or death may serve and speed
Faith and hope, that die if dream become not deed?
Naught is death and naught is life and naught is fate
Save for souls that love has clothed with fire of hate.
These behold them, weigh them, prove them, find them naught,
Save by light of hope and fire of burning thought.
What though sun be less than storm where these aspire,
Dawn than lightning, song than thunder, light than fire?
Help is none in heaven: hope sees no gentler star:
Earth is hell, and hell bows down before the czar.
All its monstrous, murderous, lecherous births acclaim
Him whose empire livs to match its fiery flame.
Nay, perchance at sight or sense of deeds here done,
Here where men may lift up eyes to greet the sun,
Hell recoils heart-stricken; horror worse than hell
Darkens earth and sickens heaven; life knows the spell,
Shudders, quails, and sinks—or, filled with fierier breath,
Rises red in arms devised of darkling death.
Pity mad with passion, anguish mad with shame,
Call aloud on justice by her darker name;
Love grows hate for love's sake; life takes death for guide.
Night hath none but one red star—tyrannicide.

God or man, be swift; hope sickens with delay:
Smite, and send him howling down his father's way!
Fall, O fire of heaven, and smite as fire from hell
Halls wherein men's torturers, crowned and cowering, dwell!
These that crouch and shrink and shudder, girt with power—
These that reign, and dare not trust one trembling hour—
These omnipotent, whom terror curbs and drives—
These whose life reflects in fear their victims' lives—
These whose breath sheds poison worse than plague's thick breath—
These whose reign is ruin, these whose word is death,
These whose will turns heaven to hell, and day to night,
These, if God's hand smite not, how shall man's not smite?
So from hearts by horror withered as by fire
Surge the strains of unappeasable desire;
Sounds that bid the darkness lighten, lit for death;
Bid the lips whose breath was doom yield up their breath;
Down the way of czars, awhile in vain deferred,
Bid the Second Alexander light the Third.
How for shame shall men rebuke them? how may we Blame, whose fathers died, and slew, to leave us free?
We, though all the world cry out upon them, know,
Were our strife as theirs, we could not strike but so;
Could not cower, and could not kiss the hands that smite;
Could not meet them armed in sunlit morning's light.
Dark as fear and red as hate though morning rise,
Life it is that conquers; death it is that dies.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

In Fritänkaren of August 1st we noted with pleasure an article by Miss Susan H. Wixon, "A Few Words Regarding the Status of Woman in Christian Countries." The article is translated by Captain Thomson, and we feel confident that its perusal will open the eyes of some Swedish women who are now the blind supporters of that curse of woman, the Christian church. An article from another well-known Liberal lady, Mrs. Matilda Joslyn-Gage, president of the Woman's National Liberal Union, is announced to appear in the next number.

The board of administration of the French Freethought Federation has petitioned the mayor of Paris to enforce the decision of April 7, 1886, whereby ten pupils are to be kept at the Pensionate-Anteclérical, founded by Mme. Tessier. If the mayor—what we do not doubt—complies with the wish of our brethren, a public recognition of Freethinkers' capability to teach children to become useful and moral members of society will be given and Mme. Tessier's Anticlerical School be placed a pari with the public school of France.—Bulletin Mensuelle.

In Austria no actual religious prosecution has taken place lately. In spite of the combined efforts of church and state the number of Liberals is steadily increasing, and they number now, under the leadership of Edward Schwella, about six thousand members of good standing. In Austria, as here in the United States, the school question is causing considerable disturbance. According to Der Lichtfreund, the pious government enacted that every child should receive religious instruction, and that this instruction should be of the legal kind, and this in spite of the law of April 18, 1890, which declares that a child is not in duty bound to attend religious studies against the wishes of its parents if the latter are members of the Free Religious Society.

The blasphemy case against Dr. Specht, Frau Wilhelmi, and Dr. Voelkel was opened on the 19th of August last, on which day several witnesses were examined. These religious prosecutions in Germany are getting so common that one would imagin they are devised to wake up the citizens to make a stand for their constitutional rights. To suppress unbelief is impossible nowadays; even in the theological desert a powerful voice has been heard. D. Adolf Harnack, one of the most prominent theologians of Germany, declares that if the Lutheran church is not to fall in ruins altogether, she "must change her confession, her style of sermons, and her teachings, not according to the wishes of the day, but according to indisputable knowledge we hav gained." In short, as Dr. Voelkel comments, "Overboard with the old belief since no one believes in it."

La Vérite informs us that the Freethought Society of Rheims, France, celebrated on July 6th "La Fête Laique de la Jeunesse" (the Festival for the Youths of the Laity). At the festival, which was a great success, there were present, besides several members from Freethought societies of neighboring cities, members of the municipality of Rheims. We call attention to this incident, common in France, to point out that such children's festivals are held by Freethinkers in several European countries, including Germany and Sweden. Why cannot we Americans follow the example set by our foreign brethren? The value of such festivals cannot be overestimated. Children are children, no matter whether their parents are Freethinkers or Christians; they all enjoy a day's amusement. Let every Freethought society organize a science Sunday-school, and hav picnics, and when the climate forbids such let concerts take their place. A good many children now frequenting the Sunday-schools of superstition would seek ours, and especially if each scholar attending could receive, on appropriate occasion, a small gift.

It is now seven years since the clerical reaction in Belgium set in, and what are the results? Since Sept. 20, 1884, when the clerical school laws were enacted, the wages of 3,336 teachers hav been considerably reduced and 880 teachers hav been informed that their service was not needed; 887 primary schools, 1,078 higher schools, and 228 kindergarten schools hav been closed, whereby 44,028 children and adults were bereft of a chance to be educated. According to the Vossischen Zeitung the teachers of Stambruges, in Hennegau, hav inaugurated a strike because they hav for nine months received no pay at all. But while education suffers, ignorance and idleness flourish. In 1846 Belgium had 137 monk cloisters with 2,951 inmates, and 642 nunneries with 9,918 nuns; now (census 1880) she has 200 monk cloisters with 3 600 inmates, and 1,473 nunneries with 17,996 nuns. Hence we see the number of cloisters has more than doubled. In 1866 the aggregate number of cloisters and inmates was 1 191 cloisters and 3,400 lazy drones. Such are the results of clerical government in the latter half of the nineteenth century. And yet people will not see the baneful influence of the union of church and state. Wake up! GUSTAVE NELSON.

Fourteenth Annual Congress.

The Fourteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union has been appointed by the board of directors to meet at Portsmouth, O., on Friday evening, October 31, 1890, and to continue its sessions on the Saturday and Sunday following.

The meetings will be held in the Grand Opera House, corner of Sixth and Court streets, and the orchestra of the establishment has been engaged for the occasion. Due notice will be given of the proposed reduction in railroad, steamboat, and hotel fares.

Portsmouth is situated on the Ohio river, one hundred miles east of Cincinnati, and one hundred miles south of Columbus, and has extensiv and convenient railway connections with the whole country. It is a port of foreign entry, and is distinguished for its numerous and magnificent manufactories. It has a population exceeding fifteen thousand, has twenty churches, the Ohio Military Academy, and a splendid system of graded schools. The Ohio valley fair is held there annually; and several English and German papers, daily and weekly, are published in the city.

The members and friends of the American Secular Union are sure of a hearty welcome, not only from our enterprising local auxiliary, but also from the citizens at large.

The object of the American Secular Union, as is well known, is to secure the total separation of church and state in fact and in form, to the end that equal rights in religion, genuin morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood be established, protected, and perpetuated. While we unite on what is commonly known as the Nine Demands of Secularism, we propose to emphasize the following at the coming Congress:

1. The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.
2. The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.
3. The repeal and prevention of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons.
4. The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character.

The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both religion and politics, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but heartily welcomes all persons, of whatever faith, to its membership, on the basis of "no union of church and state." The word "secular" is here used in the broadest sense, as applied to the state, and not to any system of religion or philosophy.

To discuss these questions in an orderly and friendly manner, and to devise ways and means to promote these objects, let us come together at this Congress as Freethinkers, Spiritualists, Unitarians, Universalists, Free Religionists, Quakers, progressiv Jews, and liberal Christians, and, laying aside our peculiar views on religious questions, unite as American citizens on the one broad platform of no union of church and state, and the complete administration of our secular government on purely secular principles.

The National Reform Association, having for its object the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the state by constitutional enactment; the American Sabbath Union, working for the enforcement, by legislation, of the Jewish and puritanic Sabbath on our free citizens; the Women's Christian Temperance Union, indorsing the platform and policy of both these organizations; the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, insisting through their ecclesiastical bodies upon the complete exemption of church property from just taxation, as well as the appropriation of public money for religious schools and other sectarian institutions; all these, and many others which might be mentioned, are imperiling our constitutional liberties. Every true Liberal and patriot, whether man or woman, should feel called upon to aid in organizing an effectiv opposition to these nefarious schemes.

Due notice will be given of the selection of eminent speakers from all portions of the United States and Canada, and a free platform will be given to all persons who may hav a word to say for pure state secularization. All, without exception, are welcome to this Congress in the wide-awake little city in the valley of the beautiful Ohio.

Tolstoi and "The Kreutzer Sonata."*

Count Tolstoï is a man of genius. He is acquainted with Russian life from the highest to the lowest—that is to say, from the worst to the best. He knows the vices of the rich and the virtues of the poor. He is a Christian, a real believer in the Old and New Testaments, an honest follower of the peasant of Palestine. He denounces luxury and ease, art and music; he regards a flower with suspicion, believing that beneath every blossom lies a coiled serpent. He agrees with Lazarus and denounces Dives and the tax-gatherers. He is opposed, not only to doctors of divinity, but of medicin.

From the Mount of Olives he surveys the world.

He is not a Christian like the pope in the Vatican, or a cardinal in a palace, or a bishop with revenues and retainers, or a millionaire who hires preachers to point out the wickedness of the poor, or the director of a museum who closes the doors on Sunday. He is a Christian something like Christ.

To him this life is but a breathing-spell between the verdict and the execution; the sciences are simply sowers of the seeds of pride, of arrogance and vice. Shocked by the cruelties and unspeakable horrors of war, he became a non-resistant and averred that he would not defend his own body or that of his daughter from insult and outrage. In this he followed the command of his master: "Resist not evil." He passed not simply from war to peace, but from one extreme to the other, and advocated a doctrin that would leave the basest of mankind the rulers of the world. This was and is the error of a great and tender soul.

He did not accept all the teachings of Christ at once. His progress has been, judging from his writings, somewhat gradual; but by accepting one proposition he prepared himself for the acceptance of another. He is not only a Christian, but has the courage of his convictions, and goes without hesitation to the logical conclusion. . . .

Count Tolstoï, following parts of the New Testament, regards love as essentially impure. He seems really to think that there is a love superior to human love; that the love of man for woman, of woman for man, is, after all, a kind of glittering degradation; that it is better to love God than woman; better to love the invisible phantoms of the skies than the children upon our knees—in other words, that it is far better to love a heaven somewhere else than to make one here. He seems to think that women adorn themselvs simply for the purpose of getting in their power the innocent and unsuspecting men. He forgets that the best and purest of human beings are controled, for the most part unconsciously, by the hidden, subtil tendencies of nature. He seems to forget the great fact of "natural selection," and that the choice of one in preference to all others is the result of forces beyond the control of the individual. To him there seems to be no purity in love, because men are influenced by forms, by the beauty of women; and women, knowing this fact, according to him, act, and consequently both are equally guilty. He endeavors to show that love is a delusion; that at best it can last but a few days; that it must of necessity be succeeded by indifference, then by disgust, lastly by hatred; that in every garden of Eden is a serpent of jealousy, and that the brightest days end with the yawn of ennui.

Of course he is driven to the conclusion that life in this world is without value, that the race can be perpetuated only by vice, and that the practice of the highest virtue would leave the world without the form of man. Strange as it may sound to some, this is the same conclusion reached by his divine master: "They did eat, they drank, they married, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered the ark and the flood came and destroyed them all." "Everyone that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life."

According to Christianity as it really is and really was, the Christian should hav no home in this world—at least none until the earth has been purified by fire. His affections should be given to God; not to wife and children, not to friends or country. He is here but for a time on a journey, waiting for the summons. This life is a kind of dock running out into the sea of eternity, on which he waits for transportation. Nothing here is of any importance; the joys of life are frivolous and corrupting, and by losing these few gleams of happiness in this world he will bask forever in the unclouded rays of infinit joy. Why should a man risk an eternity of perfect happiness for the sake of enjoying himself a few days with his wife and children? Why should he become an eternal outcast for the sake of having a home and fireside here?

The "fathers" of the church had the same opinion of marriage. They agreed with St. Paul, and Tolstoï agrees with them. They had the same contempt for wives and mothers, and uttered the same blasphemies against that divine passion that has filled the world with art and song. . . .

Count Tolstoï, in "The Kreutzer Sonata," has drawn, with a free hand, one of the vilest and basest of men for his hero. He is suspicious, jealous, cruel, infamous. The wife is infinitly too good for such a wild unreasoning beast, and yet the writer of this insane story seems to justify the assassin. If this is a true picture of wedded life in Russia, no wonder that Count Tolstoï looks forward with pleasure to the extinction of the human race.

Of all the passions that can take possession of the heart or brain jealousy is the worst. For many generations the chemists sought for the secret by which all metals could be changed to gold, and through which the basest could become the best. Jealousy seeks exactly the opposit. It endeavors to transmute the very gold of love into the dross of shame and crime.

The story of "The Kreutzer Sonata" seems to hav been written for the purpose of showing that woman is at fault; that she has no right to be attractiv, no right to be beautiful; and that she is morally responsible for the contour of her throat, for the pose of her body, for the symmetry of her limbs, for the red of her lips, and for the dimples in her cheeks.

The opposit of this doctrin is nearer true. It would be far better to hold people responsible for their ugliness than for their beauty. It may be true that the soul, the mind, in some wondrous way fashions the body, and that to that extent every individual is responsible for his looks. It may be that the man or woman thinking high thoughts will giv, necessarily, a nobility to expression and a beauty to outline.

It is not true that the sins of man can be laid justly at the feet of woman. Women are better than men; they hav greater responsibilities; they bear even the burdens of joy. This is the real reason why their faults are considered greater.

Men and women desire each other and this desire is a condition of civilization, progress, and happiness, and of everything of real value. But there is this profound difference in the sexes: in man this desire is the foundation of love, while in woman love is the foundation of this desire.

Tolstoï seems to be a stranger to the heart of woman. . . .

The author of "The Kreutzer Sonata" is unconsciously the enemy of mankind. He is filled with what might be called a merciless pity, a sympathy almost malicious. Had he lived a few centuries ago, he might hav founded a religion; but the most he can now do is, perhaps, to create the necessity for another asylum. . . .

And yet there are many writers busy pointing out the loathsomeness of love and their own virtues. Only a little while ago an article appeared in one of the magazines in which all women who did not dress according to the provincial prudery of the writer were denounced as impure. Millions of refined and virtuous wives and mothers were described as dripping with pollution because they enjoyed dancing and were so well formed that they were not obliged to cover their arms and throats to avoid the pity of their associates. And yet the article itself is far more indelicate than any dance or any dress, or even lack of dress. What a curious opinion dried apples hav of fruit upon the tree! . . .

* Extracts from an article in the North American Review of September; price 50 cents; for sale at this office.

But the worst thing in "The Kreutzer Sonata" is the declaration that a husband can by force compel the wife to love and obey him. Love is not the child of fear; it is not the result of force. No one can love on compulsion. Even Jehovah found that it was impossible to compel the Jews to love him. He issued his command to that effect, coupled with threats of pain and death, but his chosen people failed to respond.

Love is the perfume of the heart; it is not subject to the will of husbands, or kings, or God.

Count Tolstoï would establish slavery in every house; he would make every husband a tyrant and every wife a trembling serf. No wonder that he regards such marriage as a failure. He is in exact harmony with the curse of Jehovah when he said unto woman: "I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children, and thy desire shall be unto thy husband, and he shall rule over thee."

This is the destruction of the family, the pollution of home, the crucifixion of love.

Those who are truly married are neither masters nor servants. The idea of obedience is lost in the desire for the happiness of each. Love is not a convict, to be detained with bolts and chains. Love is the highest expression of liberty. Love neither commands nor obeys.

The curious thing is that the orthodox world insists that all men and women should obey the injunctions of Christ; that they should take him as the supreme example, and in all things follow his teachings. This is preached from countless pulpits and has been for many centuries. And yet the man who does follow the savior, who insists that he will not resist evil, who sells what he has and gives to the poor, who deserts his wife and children for the love of God, is regarded as insane.

Tolstoï, on most subjects, appears to be in accord with the founder of Christianity, with the apostles, with the writers of the New Testament, and with the fathers of the church; and yet a Christian teacher of a Sabbath-school decides, in the capacity of postmaster-general, that "The Kreutzer Sonata" is unfit to be carried in the mails.

Although I disagree with nearly every sentence in this book, regard the story as brutal and absurd, the view of life presented as cruel, vile, and false, yet I recognize the right of Count Tolstoï to express his opinions on all subjects, and the right of the men and women of America to read for themselvs. . .

By comparing long periods of time, we see that, on the whole, the race is advancing; that the world is growing steadily, and surely, better; that each generation enjoys more and suffers less than its predecessor. We find that our institutions hav the faults of individuals. Nations must be composed of men and women; and as they hav their faults, nations cannot be perfect. The institution of marriage is a failure to the extent, and only to the extent, that the human race is a failure. Undoubtedly it is the best and most important institution that has been established by the civilized world. If there is unhappiness in that relation, if there is tyranny upon one side and misery upon the other, it is not the fault of marriage. Take homes from the world and only wild beasts are left.

We cannot cure the evils of our day and time by a return to savagery. It is not necessary to become ignorant to increase our happiness. The highway of civilization leads to the light. The time will come when the human race will be truly enlightened, when labor will receive its due reward, when the last institution begotten of ignorance and savagery will disappear. The time will come when the whole world will say that the love of man for woman, of woman for man, of mother for child, is the highest, the noblest, the purest, of which the heart is capable.

Love, human love, love of men and women, love of mothers, fathers, and babes, is the perpetual and beneficent force. Not the love of phantoms, the love that builds cathedrals and dungeons, that trembles and prays, that kneels and curses; but the real love, the love that felled the forests, navigated the seas, subdued the earth, explored continents, built countless homes, and founded nations—the love that kindled the creativ flame and wrought the miracles of art, that gave us all there is of music, from the cradle song that givs to infancy its smiling sleep to the great symphony that bears the soul away with wings of fire—the real love, mother of every virtue and of every joy. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Moses Harman Temporarily Released.

From Lucifer.

On Saturday, August 30th, just seventeen weeks from the date of my incarceration in the Kansas state prison, I was released—discharged on the order of Judge Caldwell, of the United States circuit court. After many delays, caused in part by absence of the judge and district attorney, David Overmyer succeeded in getting an order for a new trial, on a "writ of error," I think it is technically called. The hearing of the case will take place at Topeka in November next. Before the order for discharge could take effect, a $2,500 "appearance" bond had to be filed in the clerk's office at Topeka, and also another bond of like amount binding the prisoner to prosecute said appeal "to effect," that is, to a termination.

The order for my release was brought to the prison by my son George Harman, at about 10.30 A M The officer who brought the word to the kitchen found me broom in hand, cleaning up the litter made by the process of peeling and coring a barrel of apples for dinner. That the command to pack my "traps" and follow the messenger was obeyed with alacrity, will easily be imagined. Before 12 M. the prison stripes were doffed and citizen's dress donned, and all necessary arrangements made to depart on the homeward journey. But when about to say good-bye to the officers, Deputy Warden Higgins said, "It is now near 12 o'clock; your train will not be here till 5:50. You had better go in to dinner, and then make yourself comfortable till train time." Accepting with thanks the kind invitation, we enjoyed a hearty dinner in the officer's dining hall, then took a stroll among the flower beds and ornamental shrubbery just outside the walls, then spent the remainder of the waiting hours in the warden's office, writing letters.

The ride homeward was enjoyed with a zest that can better be imagined than described. There had been a fine rain in the morning, the air was fresh and delicious, all nature wore a joyous smile, as though sorrow and suffering were things unknown. For the first time in four months I saw the sun set and moon rise, saw the green fields, the groves, and the running brooks.

Arriving at Valley Falls a little after dark, we found the platform of the station crowded with people, from many of whom the ex-convict received a hearty shake of the hand and words of earnest and doubtless honest welcome. I should be glad to record the names of all who met me at the station with fraternal and neighborly greeting, but owing to lack of space and owing to the fact that in the darkness it was impossible to recognize and remember all whose names deserve mention in such a list, I shall be obliged to forego the pleasure it would giv me to make personal mention of all and of any. Suffice it for the present to say that from the bottom of my heart I thank all who then and since then hav by words and deeds expressed pleasure at my deliverance from prison walls. MOSES HARMAN.

Looking Backward and Forward in the Harman Case.

In Lucifer, dated August 29th, though in fact printed several days later, appears an editorial by Mr. Moses Harman, headed, "Home Again," and announcing to his friends that he was released from the Kansas state prison on Saturday, August 30th, after just seventeen weeks' incarceration there.

The misfortunes, mistakes, and outrages of the first trial are sufficiently fresh in the minds of readers of the Liberal papers, but there are some things which it is now time to tell concerning the efforts of Mr. Harman's friends to effect his release. Two methods were put in operation, though they were apparently inconsistent, or at least seemed to bear no relation one to the other. Petitions for pardon were circulated and presented, while at the same time Mr. Overmyer was moving the usual processes of law to obtain a new trial.

The mills of government grind slowly, especially during the summer season when every official must hav his days or weeks of vacation, and to those who knew just what was being done it seemed a neck and neck race of the two plans with little choice between them; but the "writ of error" has won, and we all rejoice, as the object was not the success of any particular method, but the accomplishment of the release of our man.

Those who helped the petition plan will be interested to know that Mr. M. M. Pomeroy obtained an interview with President Harrison and Attorney-General Miller in behalf of Mr. Harman on July 29th; that he then presented verbal and written arguments and "brief" showing cause why Mr. Harman had been improperly convicted and imprisoned, together with a petition "of the vicinage" numbering nearly three hundred names of the business men of Valley Falls (about five-sixths of that class); and that on August 9th, a roll of over seven thousand names, two hundred feet long, was forwarded to Washington and its receipt acknowledged by the department. Many petitions hav been sent direct, and rumor says there hav been enough to occasion remark in the White House that Mr. Harman had a good many friends in a great many places. Quite a number of petitions hav come to hand since the large roll was sent in, so that one who is in a position to know has not the slightest doubt that over ten thousand names hav been signed to Harman petitions. I was about to make up another roll when the news came of Mr. Harman's release by due process of law, and it therefore hardly seems to be "timely" now to send in more petitions. We may conclude either that the two methods hav worked together for good, that the department of justice in Washington has favored and helped to make possible the new trial, or that now that there is to be a new trial the president and his advisers will consider it expedient to postpone further consideration of the policy of pardon until the regular court proceedings shall hav been concluded.

It is now a good time to recall the fact that one great reason why our opportunities for a fair hearing of this case were utterly lost in the first trial was because Mr. Harman was so short of ready means as to feel under the necessity of economizing when it was very unsafe so to do. We do not mean to ignore other reasons, nor in the light of the past could we put forth the notion that it might hav been possible to hav had a fair trial before Judge Foster with any amount of financial support that it would hav been possible to supply to Mr. Harman, but Judge Caldwell is credited with possessing a judicial spirit, and a respect for his court that will make impossible any such prostitution of it as occurred when Judge Foster disgracefully insulted his victim while sentencing him to five years' imprisonment. With Judge Caldwell on the bench and Mr. Overmyer attending to Mr. Harman's and other interests we may take new hope and work with fresh courage for the cause of liberty and justice.

By means of personal solicitation, both directly and by correspondence, a good many liberal contributions to the Harman defense fund hav been obtained: $241.15 has been sent in by forty-one persons in amounts from fifty cents to $25 each. Twenty-five dollars of this total has been used in paying the expenses of Mr. Pomeroy's trip to Washington (his time and services being his own generous contribution). The plan of sending out personal letters or direct appeals has served to obtain most of the above fund, but the method is expensiv and involves much labor. So we hope each reader of this will consider himself individually invited to help in building up the fund to at least $500 before the November trial, so that it may not only be possible to make a complete and thorough defense, but also to hav it duly reported in shape to be of service hereafter for the protection of Mr. Harman if the case should hav to be carried to the Supreme Court, or for the advantage of other defendants if the coming trial should happily terminate the case for our side. Many who hav already subscribed liberally wrote at the time expressing strongly the opinion that it is of great importance to fight this case to a finish with all the strength that we can bring to bear for the liberty of the press and mails, to determin by a fair and square test, if possible, whether the constitutional guarantees are really of any utility and force, whether they are facts to bank on or mere Fourth of July buncombe. If we hav any such rights as we hav been counting on, we must dare maintain them, and if we hav not, the sooner we know it from the highest authority the better.

Now we hav to report $216.15 on hand as so much hard shot or reliable weapons for the coming fray; are there enough friends of liberty to rally round the flag and pile up the shot until it shall foot up $500 and provide a substantial backing and support for the actual warriors who hav our fight to make, our fate to settle? All speak at once, this time, if you want to. E. B. FOOTE, JR.,

Myth.

Savage and semi-civilized peoples hav generally used figurativ language to express their ideas. That a great portion of the legends and fables are but expressions of people concerning common, every-day affairs, the ordinary events of life, has been fully shown.

Not many years ago legends and traditions were considered as entitled to as much credence as were the most authentic records of history, but recent investigations of the learned hav nearly demolished the storehouse of myth. Persons and events that the credulous of those times assigned either to the supernatural, or to certain epochs of a long past history, are now relegated to the department of mythical folk-lore. An example in point is that of Wilhelm Tell. For ages people believed that Tell was a Swiss hero who helped free his nativ land from the tyranny of the house of Hapsburg. Now, it is a fact that this identical legend is given in the folk-lores of the Danes, Norwegians, Russians, Persians, Turks, and the nations of India, in each of which Tell with his followers are represented under different names as being nativ heroes. The Swiss historian Von Wyss says that Tell's name does not occur in the history of the three cantons, and that no such governor as Gessler ever served the house of Hapsburg. The story of Cinderella, and of Beauty and the Beast, occur in the folk-lores of no less than a half-dozen different people, and in each the legends are claimed as individual and peculiar property. The truth is that nine-tenths of the folk-lore, the systems of religion, and the nursery tales that were told us during our childhood, hav a common origin. They, with the great epics of the olden time, can be traced to the East—to the Aryan nations, the Indo-European people.

The story of Tell is an old Aryan sun-myth. Tell is the solar hero whose arrows (rays) never miss their mark. Cinderella, a European maiden, when traced to her birthplace becomes an Aryan daughter of the dawn. Many of the myths hav been changed, clothed in new dresses, but the old Aryan form remains.

The succinct facts of Aryan history are that thousands of years ago there dwelt in central Asia a number of barbarian tribes united by the same manners and customs, speaking different dialects of a common tongue—the offspring of one mother family. Six hundred years B.C. these tribes migrated; one branch settled Europe and are the principal ruling nations there to-day, while from the other branch the Medes, Persians, and Hindoos hav sprung.

Now, wherever these tribes settled they established there the myths of the fatherland, and, as one tribe knew the legends and traditions of all the others, it is evident that the folk-lore would become the common property of all and be scattered throughout the length and breadth of the then known world. It is not strange then that Tell, and Arthur, and Cinderella are claimed as individual and peculiar property by so many different nations. In many instances the legends hav been clothed in different dresses, perhaps from the peculiar story-telling faculty of the narrator, perhaps from local surroundings, those of time or place, perhaps from motivs of policy. But the story is the same; the dress may be different, but the legend itself, though clothed in many garbs, retains its original form.

The analogies that exist between the folk-lores of different Aryan nations are common not only to their social and philosophical legends but to their religious traditions and creeds. The doctrins, the moral teachings, the wonderful legends (for miracles are only legends) that the religious devotee believes to be the peculiar property of his own and only inspired religion may be found in many other systems much older than his—systems over whose temples there hangs equally as much of the smoke of inspiration—whose foundations are upheld by equally as many winged, harping ghosts. If the most bigoted Hebrew will read carefully the "Zend Avesta" of the Persians, he will be compelled to admit that the resemblances existing between his own Semitic system and that of the Aryan are many and remarkable. If the most fanatical Christian will read carefully the Buddhist system of religion he will be compelled to admit that the analogies are so many and so striking as to be accounted for in no way other than that one or the other of the systems has borrowed by the wholesale, and when he makes this acknowledgment let him remember that Buddhism is much older than Christianity. An examination of the religions that hav passed away will show that the same likenesses existed to a marked degree. The Egyptian or the Grecian who thought that certain gods were peculiar to his own nation was frequently surprised to find that those deities, under different names but having the same attributes, were worshiped by other peoples, his neighbors. Like Cinderella, who though clothed in many dresses was Cinderella still. Now, some people may not be aware of the fact that the Jews never heard of Adam and Eve, the garden of Eden and the fall of man, until they saw the Persians. Such, however, is the case. The garden of Eden myth the Jews heard for the first time from the lips of the Persians. So this inspired story becomes an Aryan myth. Nor is this all. At 600 B.C. the Jews were carried captiv to Babylon by the Persians. During the seventy years of their captivity their religion underwent many changes. For instance, the ideas of the Persians concerning the immortality of the soul were accepted by the Jews and incorporated in the Hebrew faith. The Jews had no devil before their captivity by the Persians. The Persian Ahriman and his legions of devils became the Jewish Satan and his fiends. From what I hav said above I hav hoped to convey the idea that the religions of the past, as well as those of the present, are but parts of the folk-lores of dead and living peoples—that they hav a common origin, and belong as much to the region of myth as do Tell, and King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table.

An impartial examination of any religion will find but little that is not common to other systems. The newer religions hav borrowed from the older ones. So that if any religion is inspired of God, it must be the older faiths. Cinderella wore many dresses, the dress of the age in which and of the people among whom she lived, but she was Cinderella still. The Jews thought that they owned the only and original devil, but they stole their devil from the Persians; besides, the devil lived in the folk-lores of other peoples. He was called by different names, that is all. In Hindoo myth, he was the dragon Vistra; with the Greeks he was Pluto; in Persian, Ahriman; in Hebrew, and Christian, Satan; but he was the devil all the same, though he bore different names.

Man, from the earliest ages to the present, has ever striven to explain away the mysteries of his surroundings; and the folk-lores, legends, mythologies, systems of religion of the past, as well as the present, are but expressions of opinions concerning matters in those times mysterious and incomprehensible.

The history of all ages will show beyond dispute that in proportion as man has understood natural phenomena, the laws of physical science, in such a proportion has he ceased to account for his surroundings through supernatural agencies. Had the laws that govern the material universe been properly understood in the past, it is scarcely probable that the teeming storehouse of myth would ever hav been built, that the long line of gods with the Nazarene Jesus bringing up the rear would ever hav been born. If the old nameless savage whose birthplace is said to hav been somewhere under the Indian ocean had any ideas of a God or any system of religion, he has left no evidence to that effect. In his primitiv state, when his narrow cranium contained but little more sense than those of the brutes, his curiosity, if he had any, was easily satisfied. But there came a time, when he arrived at a certain stage of his journey, at which curiosity demanded an explanation of surroundings. He found no explanation except that of supernatural agencies. Had any other solution, any rational explanation, appeared to his weak, credulous mind, he would just as readily hav accepted it, and the gods would never hav been born.

Was It Murder?

She was so young, and yet so beautiful. Her long raven-black tresses, in which were still entwined some sea-weed, served to bring out in bolder relief her white, delicately chiseled features.

I thought I detected a smile on her lips; yes, there it is, hardly formed yet, but still there.

She smiled, probably, as she took that fatal plunge, happy in the thought that now she was leaving the persecutions, the sneers and jeers, of her more fortunate sisters; smiled, thinking that now she was entering that dreamless sleep from which there is no awakening; joyous at the prospect of rest, rest even in the clammy arms of Death.

There was nothing to indicate who she was or from whence she came, only the words, "Unknown, found drowned," but yet these words spoke volumes.

They spoke of a yearning to be better, a desire to gain a higher plane; of disappointment, despair, and then of the abrupt ending of a miserable life. "Peace, peace," was the cry that seemed to come from those stony lips, and, as that peace was denied her in this world, she rudely tore aside the great veil and sought it beyond.

I was turning away to leave the morgue, when I saw an old lady, dressed in widow's garb, approach. Her forehead was deeply furrowed, in her eyes was reflected the broken heart, while her white lips quivered with the emotion she strove in vain to hide.

As she tottered forward to the marble slab on which lay the body of the girl she stopped suddenly, looked again, when, clasping her hands in her agony, she piteously cried, "O God, help me now!" then fell forward upon the stone floor unconscious.

In a little while she came round, and, after taking another look at the corpse, she fully proved it to be that of her daughter, Mary Hatton, who left her home at S—— over a year ago, and had not since been heard of.

The story of her daughter's fall was one of Christian duplicity and woman's weakness.

It seemed that Mary, who, at the time of her suicide, was only seventeen years old, was a teacher in a Sunday-school, where she made the acquaintance of an elder in the church, who oft-times addressed the children on a Sabbath evening.

"He was reputed to be such a good, kind Christian gentleman," said the widow, "that I'd almost believe an angel from heaven could sin before that man would bring dishonor on me and mine."

Unknown to the widow, Mary often met this man. All through the summer were those clandestin walks taken through the shaded woodlands so much frequented by the village swains.

At last the good people of the town, envious, no doubt, at what they thought Mary's good fortune, began to gossip and hint at the "brazenness of certain hussies" they knew of and wondered "if the good, pious elder could not see through the vile minx's tactics."

Then Mary began to grow restless, the color forsook her cheeks; her head, which she carried so queenly, was now bowed, while the great black circles around her eyes and trembling lip bespoke her guilt, so the good gossips said. Yet never did her mother suspect her; she, alone, knew not of her seeming downfall, and, as usual, people wondered. Had she no eyes? they asked. Yes, of course, but—then they smiled at each other in a meaning manner, lifted their noses high in the air as if seeking to breathe a purer atmosphere, and proceeded, did those honest Christian folks who prayed to God every Sunday to deal to them as they dealt to their neighbor, to circulate stories, in strict confidence, you know, that would blacken the pure name of Christ. It was only gossip; they meant nothing, they afterward said, but start a snowball from a mountain-top and ere it reaches the plain it may be a death-dealing avalanche. Things harmless at the start may prove disastrous in the end.

One dismal November evening Mary went out ostensibly to do some shopping, but never returned. Her mother waited in that lonely cottage far into the night for her child's return, but she came not. Unable further to endure the suspense, the widow went out into the dismal streets to look for her. From house to house she went, asking tidings of her daughter, while the rain came down in torrents, drenching the anxious mother to the skin. But all in vain.

Finally, when hope was almost dead, the news came. The agent at the railway depot had sold a ticket to a gentleman who had then handed it to Mary as she boarded the New York train.

"Who was he? Well, he looked very much like Elder C——."

To him the mother next went and asked for her child. But this man of God denied everything and wondered how she could advance such a charge.

Then to her desolate home she returned, where upon her bended knees she cried to that God whom she had served so faithfully for the last half-century, to giv her back her child; but God heard not. Not until the gray dawn was stealing through the window did she retire, but, oh! how aged she had grown. Her hair was white, her cheeks were furrowed and drawn in. It was a night of agony to her, a "watch in the garden," as it were.

Selling all the little property she had, she traveled to New York in order to find her child. Days and nights she trod the streets, searching the gilded halls of vice as well as its lowest haunts, but without avail.

At last, when about to giv up in despair, she read this item in the paper and found her child in the morgue.

I assisted to convey the body home, from whence, next day, the heart-broken mother took it for burial to the little town where lay the husband and father.

Not long afterward, in response to a telegram sent me by a friend of Mrs. Hatton, I repaired to the little town of S——, just in time to catch the widow's latest word.

All funerals are sad, but this one was even more so than the common. There were four friends and myself, no weeping relativs, no priest or minister to mumble the last few words of Christian sympathy over the departed, nobody but the stolid old grave-digger, who looked on with a calm, unimpassioned eye, and we five.

It was pitiful. And yet it was the work of a man, an elder in the church of God. He it is who is responsible for these two deaths. For by taking away the honor—that priceless jewel in the crown of womanhood—of Mary Hatton, he had, in a measure, compelled her to become an outcast from society, and thus paved the way for her violent death. And, as through her daughter's honor he had dealt a fatal blow at the mother, he clearly, morally, murdered those two women as much as the murderer who was electricided in New York last week murdered his victim.

There is no greater coward, no name which ought to be held more accursed, than he who with a lie upon his lips ruins the fair and innocent.

Brother, speak kindly to the unfortunate, remember they are women, although degraded.

For gently scan your brither man,
Still gentler, sister woman,
For though they gang a kennan wrang
To step aside is human.

Fort Sill. W. K. ROBERTSON.

A Voice from the West Indies.

In looking over the laws of Trinidad I happened to come across the part which treats of the practice of "obeah." It says: "The word 'obeah' shall signify every pretended assumption of supernatural power or knowledge, whether for fraudulent or illicit purposes, or for gain, etc., etc."

The "obeah man" occupies the same place among the Africans as the "medicin man" among the Indians, and the priest or parson among other religions. His position, therefore, is of some consequence among his people, and yet he is punishable under the following: "Every person who, by the practice of obeah, or by any occult means, or by any assumption of supernatural power or knowledge, shall intimidate or attempt to intimidate any person, or shall obtain or endeavor to obtain any chattel, money, or valuable security from any other person, or to restore any other person to health, and every person who shall procure, counsel, induce, or persuade, or endeavor to persuade any other person to commit any such offense shall, on conviction before any stipendiary justice, be imprisoned with or without hard labor, for any term not exceeding six months, and if a male, may be once privately whipped during the continuance of such imprisonment."

From this we observe that the poor "obeah man" is sent to prison, and even whipped, for practicing his religion. In my opinion the Roman Catholic priest is as much indictable under this law—in fact, priests of all religions—as the "obeah man," because their profession comes under the head of the definition of "obeah." The Romish and other priests pretend to the assumption of supernatural power or knowledge; they receive money of their deluded victims for the purpose of assuming to know of the supernatural, and yet they are allowed to go scot-free, and the priest of the African is liable to be imprisoned and whipped. O tempora, O mores!

Under the head of Blasphemy I find: "Blasphemy, writing and publishing, or printing and publishing, any blaspemous libel. . . . In each and every of the above cases, every such offender shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall suffer such punishment by a fine or imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for such term not exceeding two years, or by both fine and imprisonment, as the court shall think fit and proper."

This is the notorious law under which this priest-ridden and "cloven foot" government wanted to prosecute the present writer for blasphemy for printing and distributing tracts describing the propensities of the "Bible God." But they failed—ignominiously failed. Whilst the authorities, headed by an inspector of police—a bigoted, fanatical Irishman who instead of attending to his duties is seen every minute of the day either in the church or in the company of certain priests, making merry over the "ould craythur"—were taking evidence, the present writer defied them and still continued the distribution of his tracts, to the great annoyance of the clergy, and with this consequence, that he has completely vindicated the cause of Freethought in his country and has made it very popular.

The Roman Catholic archbishop of Port-of-Spain is as fat and rosy an archbishop as can be seen anywhere. His greatest pleasure is to drive about the city in his carriage and pair, and dressed up in his finest cassocks, and he is quite a "masher."

A description of the Hindoo feast of passing the fire, or Thini Therunal, which occurred this month, might not be out of place. This is a sacrifice to the deities. For some weeks before, the sacrificers liv in the temple making invocations, etc., to the deities. Every other day the idols are carried three times around the temple by the sacrificers, accompanied with singing, drum-beating, dancing, etc. The females, with boxes filled with rice, cocoanuts, and fruits, offer them as sacrifices to the deities. A large pole thirty feet high, with steps, is erected in front of the temple. On the top is a platform on which is placed camphor, incense, cocoanuts, and other fruits. On the day of the festival a young Indian bedecked with fancy clothing, and with a bow and arrow, climbs up the pole and at every step sings a verse from the Hindoo scriptures. When he gets to the top he lights the incense and offers a sacrifice. On the ground a little distance from the pole is a large pile of wood, and this is lighted by the young Indian when he comes down from the pole.

After this is to be seen a very curious sight. It is the Indians who torture themselvs by means of parasol wires being passed through their sides, and which are being continually kept wet with water. The high priest has a wire which pierces his upper lip, through the tongue to the lower lip. Then comes the cruel part of the performance, the offering of the goats and cocks. These poor animals and birds are decapitated. Some of the gods prefer goats, some chickens, and others rice and fruits. About 3 P M. the candidates are collected—only men. They form a procession and take a bath in the sea before passing through the fire. Around the pile of wood, which occupies a space of about twenty feet square, are drains filled with water. Now comes the critical moment. The candidates come with a terrible noise and pass through the fire three times; they are then whipped and sent home purified, and thus ends the yearly feast of Thini Therunal. E. S.

A Watchful Providence.

It would seem sacrilegious and cruel to criticise or comment upon any incident or saying in connection with the Quincy, Mass., disaster, August 19th, but for the opportunity of illustrating the ignorance or bigotry, perhaps both, with which religion binds its devotees.

One of the passengers, in relating his experience to a reporter, said: "How did I escape? I hardly know; it was a miracle! Why I and a few others should hav been chosen from the fifty or more to escape so easily, I do not know; it must hav been a watchful providence." Yet he goes on to tell how by natural means he left the car, after having called it "a miracle," and due a "watchful providence."

Such is the stupidity and nonsense of Christian belief that repeatedly we hear and read in this, and similar occurrences, "His escape was miraculous," "A providential refuge," etc.

Now, in this Quincy disaster, providence permitted a workman's track jack to remain on the track, when if he then had removed it by a miracle, there would hav been no disaster at all, and he would hav had no need to work the other miracle by which Mr. Pennell and the few others were saved. But no, the workmen heard the approaching train and leaped from the track to save their lives, leaving the jack behind them, and the engin and cars striking it were derailed, and twenty-two persons killed or hav since died, and as many more seriously injured or maimed for life. God worked no miracle to lift that jack from the road and prevent the disaster! But he chose to save the life of Mr. Pennell and a few others in the doomed car, and so his "watchful providence" knocked a hole through the bottom of the car large snough for him to crawl through, and a few others, while some fifty were dead, dying, or being suffocated around him.

Now, God saw that jack, knew it would derail that express train, in which were several hundred passengers, but he saw not fit to interfere to prevent the awful catastrophe, but let the train run on it, and engin, cars, and passengers be wrecked together, hot, dense steam scalding and blinding those who could otherwise hav escaped! But he, all indifferent to the many who perished, was busy with his "watchful providence," choosing and planning how to save Mr. Pennell and a few others in that doomed car!

Three children of one family, and their mother, and her husband's mother, taken out of the same car dead or dying, and the only remaining little girl, ten years old, so bruised she is not yet out of danger, while a "watchful providence" is knocking a hole through the car in order to let Mr. Pennell and the few escape! Surely God's ways are not our ways, when he bereft Mr. Fenly of his three children, his mother, and his wife, by one stroke, and spared Mr. Pennell in the same car by his "watchful providence." It is not surprising that Mr. Pennell should wonder why he and a few others should hav been chosen by a "watchful providence" when he and they, probably, were no better than those that an *un*watchful providence chose to hav killed or shockingly injured or maimed.

Cannot anyone see that there was a natural cause for the hole being knocked through the car as much as for the train being derailed by the jack? Will the derailing be laid to a "watchful providence," or will the frightened workmen be convicted and the railroad company compelled to pay damages all around? Why not indict providence, since he creates evil as well as good, and works a miracle to kill as well as to save?

Oh, how silly such belief in the last decade of the nineteenth century, in these United States of America! And yet our dailies and popular papers publish such stuff as if they believed it true. What a contrast from the present could we take up no book or paper and hav our good sense offended by such sophistry, or our reason challenged by a faith that every thinker must perceive has no foundation in reality!

It does seem as if these bigoted ones might be reached, but when I realize that it is ingrained I giv up in hopeless despair. ELLA E. GIBSON.

CHRISTIANITY and the Roman empire were in the attitude of two animals on the point of devouring each other, without knowing what are the causes of their hostility. When a society of men takes such an attitude as the Christians did in the midst of a great society, and when it becomes in the state a republic of itself, even were it composed of angels, it is a scourge. It is not without reason that they were detested, these men in appearance so gentle and so beneficent. They were in reality demolishing the Roman empire. They were drinking its strength; they were robbing its functions, especially the army, of the finest subjects. It is useless to say a man is a good citizen because he pays his taxes, is charitable, sober, and settled, when he is in reality a citizen of heaven, and considers the earthly fatherland simply as a prison where he is chained up side by side with wretches. WHEREVER sectarian feeling is keenly felt, it proves stronger than patriotism.—Lecky.

IT can hardly be doubted that . . . we must, sooner or later, substitute the more comprehensiv view, that life is a property of all matter, and that the classification of bodies into animate and inanimate, or into organic and inorganic, is merely a provisional arrangement, convenient, perhaps, for our present purposes, but which, like all similar divisions, will eventually be merged in a higher and wider scheme. —Buckle.

WE thus arrive at the extremely important conviction that all natural bodies which are known to us are equally animated, that the distinction which has been made between animate and inanimate bodies does not exist. When a stone is thrown into the air, and falls to earth according to definit laws, or when in a solution of salt a crystal is formed, the phenomenon is neither more nor less a mechanical manifestation of life than the growth and flowering of plants, than the propagation of animals or the activity of their senses, than the perception or the formation of thought in man.—Haeckel.

YOU despise books; you whose whole lives are absorbed in the vanities of ambition, the pursuit of pleasure, or indolence; but remember that all the known world, except only savage nations, is governed by books. All Africa, to the limits of Ethiopia and Nigritia, obeys the book of the Koran, after bowing to the book of the Gospel. China is ruled by the moral book of Confucius, and a great part of India by the Vedah. Persia was governed for ages by the books of one of the Zoroasters.—Voltaire.

HITHERTO the learned in Italy hav not enjoyed the consideration to which they were entitled. They lived retired in their laboratories and libraries, too happy if they could escape the notice, and consequently the persecution, of kings and priests. It is no longer thus—there is no longer religious inquisition, nor despotic power. Thought is free in Italy. I invite the literary and scientific persons to consult together, and propose to me their ideas on the subject of giving new vigor and life to the fine arts and the sciences. All who desire to visit France will be received with distinction by the government. The people of France hav more pride in enroling among their citizens a skilful mathematician, a painter of reputation, a distinguished man in any class of literature, than in adding to their territories a large and wealthy city.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

Mr. Wendling's Mistake.

The South, apparently, is waking up on religious questions. We hav answered questions for two Southern readers in the two previous issues of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and here is another inquirer for facts from Warrensburg, Mo. He sends us a clipping from a local journal, reporting a speech by that noted "answerer" of Ingersoll, Hon. George R. Wendling, with the request that our views be developed thereon. The gist of Mr. Wendling's statement is this:

"That Christianity was the main lever in pushing civilization, art, science, commerce, and in fact everything that helps or ennobles the human race."

This is by no means the first time we hav met this assertion, and it is just as false now as it was decades ago. But it is a lie that "is still on its travels, going from Sunday-school to Sunday-school, from pulpit to pulpit, from hypocrit to savage—that is to say, from missionary to Hottentot—without the slightest evidence of fatigue—fresh and strong, and in its cheeks the roses and lilies of perfect health."

The influence of Christianity upon the world, instead of making for progress, instead of pushing civilization, art, science, commerce, has been conservativ and retarded all of them. Its measures are measures of hundreds of years ago, and so far as it has abandoned them it has become no longer Christianity. The Christian church has opposed innovation, progress, invention, in short, all science, as long as it could, and when compelled to retreat from its untenable position, has turned round and claimed the credit of championing the advance. So it was in the abolition of slavery, the church praying the negro into slavery and keeping him there with texts from the Bible, hurling anathema after anathema at the heads of the Abolitionists for wanting him free. But when the Infidel Lincoln struck his fetters off, the church turned round and said, Behold our work. Proof that the church did nothing can be found in thousands of sermons, in the fact that the aiders and abettors of the whip-scarred slave were Infidels and Quakers, and further that all the prominent Abolitionists joined the ranks of the Freethinkers, lecturing and working for the emancipation of white men's minds from a slavery no less degrading, from a thraldom no less galling, than physical slavery.

As to art, "the commandment, 'Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth,' was the absolute death of Art, aud not till after the destruction of Jerusalem was there a Hebrew painter or sculptor." Christians who giv to us the "living canvas and the breathing stone" are breaking the commandments of their God, and are heretics. Real Christians, it would seem, ought to keep the commandments.

As to science, which makes commerce and civilization possible, how has Christianity helped it? The late Professor Draper, who is one of the best authorities on the conflict, says: "The history of science is not the mere record of isolated discoveries; it is the narrativ of the conflict of two contending powers, the expansiv force of the human intellect on the one side, and the compression arising from traditionary faith and human interests on the other." This "expansiv force of the human intellect" is the brave heretics which every age has produced—pioneers in clearing the way through theological labyrinths; the traditionary faith is the church; the human interests the efforts of a priesthood to enslave mankind. The interest of the church was and is best subserved by keeping the people ignorant. Knowledge of the shallowness and falseness of the claims of the self-appointed ministers is a dangerous weapon to put into the hands of a layman, and the authorities of the church knew it. They know it now better than ever, and that is why we hear this persistent reiteration of the service Christianity has rendered to the world. If the priests can only make the people believe they are or hav been of some use, they hope to retain their sinecures. To hear the churchmen talk one would think their establishment had done nothing but build colleges for the spread of science, when everyone knows that the pages of history are red with the blood of thousands of martyrs to science. Every man who gave birth to a new thought was hunted down and slain, if priestly power could do it. "As to science, she has never," as the same author says, "sought to ally herself to civil power. She has never attempted to throw odium or inflict social ruin on any human being. She has never subjected any one to mental torment, physical torture, least of all to death, for the purpose of upholding or promoting her ideas. She presents herself unstained by cruelties and crimes. But in the Vatican—we hav only to recall the Inquisition—the hands that are now raised in appeals to the most merciful are crimsoned. They hav been steeped in blood."

The church was overthrown in the conflict as to the shape of the earth; in her insistence that the earth is the central and most important part of the universe; and also in the controversy respecting the age of the world.

Who does not remember Hypatia and Cyril—philosophy and Christian bigotry! As Cyril treated Hypatia so has the church in all ages treated philosophy and science. The fate of the gifted woman was intended by the church as a warning to all who would cultivate profane learning.

Can anyone believe that a religion that would burn a Bruno has any sympathy with the science he taught? Bruno was an Infidel. He doubted transubstantiation and the immaculate conception. He was also a devoted student of science, and for these things he was consigned to the flames. How the church did love the heretic! how she aided science! Sacred science was confined to four propositions, every one of which has been disproved. They were: 1. That the date of creation was not more than four or five thousand years before Christ; 2. That the world was made in six days from nothing; 3. That the deluge was universal, and the animals which survived it were preserved in the ark; 4. That Adam was created perfect, but fell in consequence of having been tempted to eat an apple.

All science outside of these ridiculous and untenable propositions was of the devil, and its promulgators were given in this world a foretaste of what their heavenly father was preparing for them in the next. Errors in religion, even, were punished with corporal tortures, and errors in this "sacred science" were promptly followed by death.

As for philosophy, the church, Protestant and Catholic, did all it could to discourage its study. The Catholics murdered Hypatia, and Luther and Melancthon, the leaders of the Reformation, were determined to banish it from the church. "Luther declared that the study of Aristotle is wholly useless; his vilification of that Greek philosopher knew no bounds. 'He is,' says Luther, 'truly a devil, a horrid calumniator, a wicked sycophant, a prince of darkness, a real Apollyon, a beast, a most horrid impostor on mankind, one in whom there is scarcely any philosophy, a public and professed liar, a goat, a complete epicure, this twice execrable Aristotle.' The schoolmen were, so Luther said, 'locusts, caterpillars, frogs, lice.' These opinions were also entertained by Calvin." The worthies held that the Bible contained the sum and substance of all knowledge useful or possible to man. Everything in physical science or in philosophy must lie upon the procrustean bed of the Pentateuch.

And yet the leaders of Christianity teach that to Christianity we owe the civilization of this century They are, indeed, blind teachers of the blind. If there is one invention of importance, one step forward in progress, one new fact in science that has not been fought by the church, we do not remember it. Printing, the art that has done so much for the world, was to the churchmen of the Middle Ages the work of the devil. Steam locomotion was, according to them, an idea which proceeded from the same source; the idea of sending a vessel across the ocean propelled by steam was thought by a Christian community to be flying in the face of providence. God had made the winds to fill the sails, and to use any other power was sacrilege. The telegraph met with pious opposition. Grave old deacons solemnly protested against putting lightning-rods upon houses because God made the lightning and hurled the bolts from his own hand. To thwart his will was, to say the least, very impious. The fanning-mill was blasphemy.

No one dares claim that Christianity ever had a kindly feeling for science. The primitiv church was for abolishing all philosophy from within its limits. During the hundreds of years when the church swayed her scepter over the old world all was intellectual darkness. Scarcely a layman could be found who could sign his own name. While the Moors and Mohammedans were making vast strides forward Christianity was persecuting them, burning every book it could lay its hands on and beheading every man who wrote one. Magnificent libraries were ruthlessly consigned to the flames. The astronomy of the church consisted in saying the earth was flat, and the sun, moon, and stars were lights set by God in the firmament. Its physicians consulted the entrails of sheep and nailed bloody tokens to the doors of houses to influence the sex of children. All the knowledge they got must first be measured by the Bible.

If persecuting every student of nature, everyone who endeavored to help mankind rise from low savagery to enlightened civilization, is retarding progress, then the Christian church has certainly been a bane to the world. It opposed astronomy and imprisoned the astronomers. It opposed medicin, and burnt the doctors. It has waged a continuous warfare upon science. In the fourteenth century the church burnt alive a man of seventy years because he said the earth was round, and one of the greatest painters of the time represented him as struggling in the flames of hell. Everyone knows that Galileo suffered for his heresy. The existence of the antipodes was denied because "the apostles were commanded to go into all the world and to preach the gospel to every creature. They did not go to any such part of the world as the antipodes, they did not preach to any creature there, ergo, no antipodes exist."

When Columbus said that by sailing west a new continent might be discovered, he was laughed to scorn by the learned men of the church. No such continent was mentioned in the Bible; therefore it did not exist. The theologians overwhelmed him with quotations from the Psalms, from St. Paul, from Augustine. Even after he had demonstrated the truth of his theory of the earth's sphericity the church, by its highest authority, again committed itself to the theory of its flatness.

Magellan encountered the same opposition from the Christians. Even after he sailed around the earth the church still swore it was flat.

Can it be said that the science of geography owes anything to the church?

For thirty-six years Copernicus did not dare publish his "Revolution of the Heavenly Bodies." And when he did the church burnt his book, and had he not died would undoubtedly hav served the author in the same way. Martin Luther, the great apostle of Protestant Christianity, said: "People gave ear to an upstart astrologer, who strove to show that the earth revolves, not the heavens or the firmament, the sun and moon. Whoever wishes to appear clever must devise some new system, which of all systems is, of course, the very best. This fool wishes to reverse the entire science of astronomy. But sacred scripture tells us that Joshua commanded the sun to stand still and not the earth." Melancthon, another great light of the church, said substantially the same. And so did the whole Christian world.

The doctrin of Copernicus was denounced by the church as "heretical" and "Atheistic." The Dominican father Caccini said that "geometry is of the devil, and mathematicians should be banished as the authors of all heresies," and for this scientific utterance he was promoted by the church. The bishop of Fiesole screamed in rage against the system. The archbishop of Pisa sought to deliver Galileo to the Inquisition. The archbishop of Florence condemned the doctrin as unscriptural. The whole Christian church took up arms against the heresy, and Galileo was finally imprisoned by the Inquisition.

Christianity was in existence fifteen centuries before it produced an astronomer, and when one arose the church persecuted him so that he delayed publishing his works over thirty years.

Can it be said that the science of astronomy owes anything to the Christian religion?

Medicin was also opposed to the church. St. Augustine speaks of the "medical men who are called anatomists," and says that "with a cruel zeal for science they hav dissected the bodies of the dead, and hav pried into the secrets of the human body to learn the nature of disease and how it might be cured." In the thirteenth century Pope Innocent III. forbade surgical operations. Pope Honorius forbade medicin to be practiced by those under his spiritual authority. The Dominicans banished books on medicin. Pope Boniface VIII. interdicted dissection as sacrilege. The greatest physician of the time was accused of sorcery, and of dealing with the devil. The archbishop of Tarragona excommunicated him. He was driven from Paris and Montpellier, and finally every place in France was closed against him and he became an outcast. According to the church all the astronomers were Infidels and Atheists, and the chemists and physicians were sorcerers and leaguers with the devil. Even inoculation for the cure of small-pox, for which Christian physicians contend so strenuously now, was denounced as of the devil; and the use of chloroform in obstetrical operations was opposed as avoiding the primeval curse of woman pronounced by God in the Garden.

Can it be said that medicin is indebted to Christianity for the progress it has made?

Geology and geologists suffered the same persecutions at the hands of the churchmen. From the first inception of this science war was waged upon it, for the church saw in it, as it had in astronomy, the complete overthrow of the Mosaic account of creation. The Christian idea was that God made everything just as we see it at the beginning, and to say that anything had been made since was heresy. In the sixteenth century the faculty of Paris destroyed all treatises on geology, banished the authors from Paris, and forbade them to liv in towns or enter places of public resort. In the middle of the eighteenth century Buffon attempted to state simple and fundamental geological truths, when the theological faculty of the Sorbonne set upon him, forced him to recant, and to print his recantation. And the most bitter war upon this science was waged by Protestants, English theologians being the most fierce.

It can hardly be claimed that Christianity did much for geology.

And so it has been with all sciences. Even the rude science of agriculture was opposed by the church. The peasants of Russia were at one time interdicted from raising and eating potatoes. As before mentioned, the use of the fanning-mill was blasphemous, and contrary to the text that the "wind bloweth where it listeth;" and in the early part of this century such use was considered as being in league with the devil, and sufficient excuse for excommunication from the Scotch church. The introduction of railways into France was declared by an archbishop to be an evidence of divine displeasure against country tavern-keepers who had given their guests meat on fast-days, and railroads and telegraphs were denounced from hundreds of pulpits as being "heralds of Antichrist." The discussion of the question whether man sprung from one pair or several pairs was in our own country but a few years ago declared Atheistic, and the proposer of the question was called to order and silenced by a noted Protestant divine. At one time it was held by the church that any map of the world that did not place Jerusalem in the center was impious. The taking of a census was denounced in Sweden and our country by the church. Life insurance, too, has been regarded as blasphemy. The writings of Darwin, Huxley, Lyell, and others hav been denounced by archbishops as "shameful theories," and fatal to morality. A college of medicin was, but a few years ago, denounced because one of its professors could find no soul in man.

Christianity, as a religion, has never done anything for the education of humanity. Some men hav arisen in all ages, who, although Christians, could not be kept down by the church, and they hav founded schools and advanced science. But the church has always hunted them as heretics. Could Copernicus, Galileo, Bruno, Bacon, speak from their almost forgotten graves they could tell how Christianity aided science in the Middle Ages. And wherever the church got control of a school it either destroyed it or confined its teaching to the arithmetical problem of how to make one three and three one. It was not Christianity that founded universities, but the irresistible spirit of progression which the church could not wholly repress. The Roman Catholic church hated the Reformation, yet the Reformation came. Christians might as well claim that the church aided that as to say Christianity aided science. The nearest approach to a perfect Christian institution was the Inquisition, which Paramo of Sicily traces from the almighty down through the patriarchs Moses, Nebuchadnezzar, and King David.

The church has been the great drag upon the world, keeping it back as long as she was able, and then when anything has been accomplished in spite of her she has claimed the credit. We could multiply these instances a thousand fold. But we hav said enough to show that to the Christian religion the world is indebted for nothing, while to the brave, persistent efforts of heretics it owes everything. Thus far science has conquered in every case. As Professor White says: "There has never been a scientific theory framed from the use of scriptural texts, wholly or partially, which has been made to stand." Every time the Bible and the church hav had to giv way to science and scientific methods. Religious men hav accomplished much; the Christian religion has done nothing. It has been a tremendous obstacle to all reforms, all advancement. But men are rapidly learning its true worth, and it will not be many years ere they will laugh to scorn its pretensions as a civilizer, and he will be a brave minister indeed (or idiotic) who will claim that it is anything but a bundle of superstitions and traditions which should be laid on the same shelf as the mythology of the pagan gods.

Quibbles.

Our friend Burr writes concerning our gentle criticism of Mr. Lyman C. Howe:

"Your indictment of Lyman C. Howe for self-contradiction will hav to be quashed. Inadvertently and unintentionally you hav garbled his language. He did not say, 'The slates were ALL filled with messages,' but, speaking generally, 'The slates are filled.' He doubtless is well aware that there are exceptional cases when the slate is not filled at all, even after repeated trials.

"Furthermore, it appears from your own statement that it was not Mr. Howe, but the medium Reid, who said, 'The slates are filled with messages.'

"This appears to be a worse blunder than when you misconstrued a statement of Miss Wixon, and, comparing it with a private note of mine, thought you had detected in me a want of accuracy. BURR."

In indorsing Mr. Reid in his letter to the Spiritual Instructor Mr. Howe made Mr. Reid's statement to private sitters his own, and this after having had sittings with him which were in every case total failures, as he now tells us. Certainly the public was deceived by his statement, and it is this deception which we protest against. The inadvertent substitution of the words "were all" for "are" in no wise changes the matter.

We did not misconstrue a statement by Miss Wixon. Mr. Burr made assertions regarding a sitting the editor of our "Children's Corner" had with a medium which were not borne out by the statements of the editor herself. That is all.

Editorial Notes.

AT the Single Tax convention held in this city last week the Rev. Dr. Thackeray proposed the formation of a Single Tax Brotherhood of Religious Teachers. The idea developed opposition of a character which showed that some of the single taxers did not take much stock in religion or in clergymen. One speaker had this to say: "These men [ministers] hav been talking from their pulpits for centuries, and what hav they done? Henry George has done more in ten years than they hav done in a thousand." W. T. Croasdale, in a vigorous speech, which was vehemently applauded, said the American system of government was based upon a separation of church and state, and that clergymen as such should not be represented in the single-tax movement. Dr. Thackeray's amendment was defeated by a unanimous vote.

THE "Kreutzer Sonata" has afforded the authorities of Philadelphia a chance to show their ignorance. A half-dozen street pedlers hav been arrested for selling the book by order of Police Superintendent Lamon. At the trial Mr. Lamon said he had read considerable about the book, and on Friday a citizen had complained to him about its sale on the street. In the opinion of the witness the book was obscene. It was not a decent book for anybody to read. It was on this account that the witness had interdicted it. "You hav no power to interdict," said Counselor Arundel. The counsel then requested the witness to point out some passages in the book which he considered obscene. The witness picked a copy of the book from a basketful near him, and turned to that part which denounced marriage as being unchristian and unchaste. He read the passage slowly, and when he had concluded it he said he considered it obscene. He then read other passages. The counsel asked if he had read Fielding, Pope, and Shakspere. Mr. Lamon replied that he had, and the counsel inquired if he had not found more obscene utterances in these works, and Mr. Lamon was not sure that he had. "Or in the Bible?" persisted the counsel. Mr. Lamon became indignant, and hotly replied: "I won't answer that question." "So you hold that the doctrin inculcated in this book is pernicious?" continued counsel. "I do, and it has been interdicted by the postmaster-general." Mr. Arundel held that the work was not obscene, and asked that the men might be discharged. "What!" exclaimed the magistrate, "do you mean to say that the passages just read are not obscene?" "A perverted mind might so construe them," was the quiet rejoinder. The court appeared confused. Mr. Arundel said that he had read the work, but the court asked if he would allow the book to enter his home and be read by his daughter. "I hav no daughter," was the reply, "and there is no use quibbling over this matter. No judge would hold these defendants, as they are merely the agents of others." Counsel asked that the magistrate read this book before giving a decision, but the court ruled that the work was obscene, and held the defendants in $500 bail each, with the remark that every person caught selling the book on the street would be arrested. Counsel raised the point that the same work was sold in bookstores, and the magistrate said that if complaint was made about the sales, he would take the same action he had in this case. Counselor Arundel will test the matter by a writ of habeas corpus, confident of securing the acquittal of his clients. Monumental jackasses is a mild name for these suppressors.

Personal.

Our friends and Mr. Heston's friends will be delighted to learn that his health is rapidly improving and that within a short time he will again be designing pictures for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Everybody we know will rejoice that Mr. Mendum of the Investigator holds his own with disease and old age, and that his eighty years bid fair to lengthen into many more. He recently suffered a severe attack of illness that alarmed his friends, but the last Investigator reports him doing well.

Mr. Bradlaugh says in the last National Reformer: "When this reaches the reader I hope to be on Loch Long fishing, and to hav arrived there midday Tuesday. I shall remain with the fishes and midges until midday Saturday, 13th September, returning to London by the night mail. Although I hav not worked this year nearly so hard as in any of the thirty-five previous years of my life, I hav felt less able than heretofore to bear any heavy strain, and I need the rest I take."

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Watts passed through this city last week on their way to their Toronto home. They had been recreating at their old London home for a few weeks. Mr. Watts is looking strong and well, but his wife is better-looking than he is. The genial Canadian lectured several times to his old friends, though the London fog took away his voice for a while, and was most heartily welcomed. He returns to his work for Freethought invigorated and enthusiastic. Canada, he says, will soon be a civilized country, where a gentleman can liv without bending a knee to the preachers. Times are changing there owing to the activ efforts of the Canadian Secularists.

The Boston Record prints this paragraph: "Mrs. Robert G. Ingersoll is the recipient of countless tracts, church prints, leaflets, and religious publications embracing every modern creed. The senders evidently hav one shrewd point in mind—believing firmly that if they can reach Mrs. Ingersoll successfully, she can be depended upon to win over the eloquent Robert." The senders might as well spare themselvs the trouble and save their postage. Mrs. Ingersoll is altogether too kind-hearted to ever become a Christian, and too big-brained to heed their tracts. She knows already all that the church can say, and she does not feel the more kindly toward it for its persistent, scurrilous, spiteful, and idiotic abuse of Colonel Ingersoll. When the church gets Mrs. Ingersoll away from her husband, the heavens will collapse—and there doesn't seem to be any immediate danger of that.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY'S Catalog of Freethought, Reform, and Scientific Books will be mailed free to any address upon application.

Letters from Friends.

HALIFAX, N. S., Aug. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to see that the picture book is in press, and hope to hav it soon. I hav got a number to take THE TRUTH SEEKER here. I should like to hav more. But I am glad that Freethought is increasing here, slowly but surely. I will write you in a few days. W. JOHNSTON.

BUSHNELL, ILL., Aug. 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I do not want to miss a number. I shall be glad to welcome Heston back. What most disturbs my mental equanimity is the inertia of so many who call themselvs (confidentially) Freethinkers. They are not Freethinkers, or they would not be afraid to show their colors.

Yours for truth though the heavens fall, S. L. BABBITT.

GREENVILLE, PA., Aug. 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Another hypocrit has been preaching virtue and holiness in connection with his orthodox mythology until he came to hav no more respect for virtue than he did for his orthodox doctrins. The person who has had his name added to the long list of hypocrits and criminals this time is Rev. H. E. Johnson, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church of Greenville, Pa. This humbug disciple of Jesus has been very strict with the young people of his church and would not hav them go to dances or theaters, or read any works of fiction, but it has now been found out that he has enticed a number of young ladies into his study and not less than twenty-three charges of an immodest nature hav been brought against him. Rev. (?) Johnson was bitterly opposed to all "Infidels" and an ardent advocate of the doctrin of biblical infallibility and a vicarious atonement, a fact which no doubt accounts for his immoral crimes.

A. W. D.

MOMINNVILLE, TENN., Aug. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Some months ago I purchased a few copies of those "Self-Contradictions." I wrote a short history of the Bible, etc., and put in it for an introduction. I hav handed out thousands of circulars, and sold several "Self-Contradictions." This has raised a rumpus. Yesterday Lee Harris, "the Cow-boy Preacher," formed a crowd near my house, and sang, prayed, preached, all in thirty minutes, and then held up his hand, saying: "I hav here a little tract, pamphlet, book, or whatever you choose to call it. I hav written it in answer to that Infidel's 'One Hundred and Forty-four Contradictions of the Bible.' I sell them for fifteen cents." But no one bought. He then offered tickets to the Opera House lecture that he was going to giv about his cowboy life and travels in Africa. Nobody bought. So the parson was mistaken both in the place and the title of the book, for it is: "One Hundred and Forty-four Propositions, and Hundreds of Self-Contradictions." And as he left without lecturing, I did not see the book, but if he has printed it as he spoke it, then I hav got him foul.

J. FLETOH WOODWARD.

CHINA GROVE, N. C., Aug. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: We hav been blessed with the annual Methodist revival, and a revival it was, too, consisting of three days and one night, two sermons per diem. I visited every day, and was lucky to hear the pastor, man of God, etc., the Rev. Mr. York, tell a characteristic Christian lie. It ran as follows, in the author's own words: "Tom Paine, the prince of Infidels, who wrote against the word of God, who denied the existence of hell, on his deathbed said to his physician, 'If you save my life for two weeks I'll giv you half of my fortune.' 'I cannot do it,' said the physician, 'and you hav but a short time to liv.' And said Paine, 'If I die now I'll go to hell.'" Hurrah for York! Can he be excelled at his trade? He should bear the title, prince of the liars, as Thomas Paine was prince of the Infidels. It takes gospel-pounders to lie. They cannot be excelled.

But it would be unfair to close this letter without giving the result of the revival. It was as follows: One convert, and that a child of only ten or twelve years of age, who no doubt was persuaded by the pastor to go up to God around the altar of Harris Chapel, Methodist Episcopal church, South, of which the Rev. Mr. York is sky-pilot and conductor of ceremonies. A TRUTHSEEKER.

SAN DIEGO, CAL., Aug. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am a reader of and take great interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please allow me a small place in your valuable paper. I am rather advanced in life—ninety-four years of age. I still take great interest in the welfare of my country and that of humanity. It givs me pain to see so many of my fellow-beings living in the bonds of superstition, bigotry, fraud, and deception, perfectly satisfied to accept some other person's sayings instead of investigating for themselvs, no matter of what vital importance the subject may be.

I joined the Baptist church when I was about sixteen years of age. I often think of the question Deacon Knapp asked me when I related my experience to the church. This was it: "Lewis, do you think you love God so much or to that extent that in case he in his infinit wisdom, justice, and love should decide it was absolutely necessary for justice that he should send you to hell there to dwell in eternal torment for ever and ever, you could love and praise God there in that condition?" Thinks I, that is a choker. I said nothing. There was a spasm above my heart. I looked about the audience. They were all looking at me. I said nothing. He repeated his question as before. I finally said, "S'poseso"—left off the I. I remained in the church about forty years, more or less a doubter. I finally withdrew. I could act the hypocrit no longer.

I was a volunteer soldier in the war of 1812, and at Plattsburg the 12th of September. Truly yours, DR. L. POST.

SALIDA, COL., Aug. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to call the attention of Brother Peck and other anti-Catholics to two vital, central facts. Religious liberty has been already overthrown in this country, and it is not the work of Catholics, but of Protestants. What the Catholics may do some day if they get the power, we can judge; what the Protestants hav done and are doing is not a matter of conjecture. The Methodist church is the leader in treason. If the Catholics ever set up their rule in America it will be when Protestant plotters hav prepared the way. And this Catholic reign, if it comes, will come in good season and will subserve the interest of liberty. All dissenters will fare alike. Christians will lose their liberty. Infidels hav now very little to lose. The little popes will learn the value of freedom to others by being deprived of it themselvs; and if principle fail, self-interest will impel them to join hands with the Liberals in a common defense of a just, impartial government.

The proposition to disfranchise Catholics is absurdly impractical, besides being anti-American and unsecular. What gain to destroy the Inquisition of Rome to set one up in America? The republic asks no questions about a man's religion, establishes no test, knows no constructiv treason. All the churches build their heaven into a monarchy, hav their liveried embassadors, and avow their allegiance to a king. Not what a man believes, but what he does; this is the American test. And tried by this rule the Protestants of America, not the Catholics, are the rebels and traitors. Puritan New England compelled a man to join the church before he could vote. The Catholics of Maryland invited Protestants to share with them their religious liberty and when the guests got the majority they disfranchised them. These are the style of men who hav made liberty a name, equality a mockery. How many in the long list of outrages compiled by you, Mr. Editor, are chargeable to Catholic aggression? Steal! Of course, they'll all steal from the public. But who make the laws that disgrace our statutes? And who are enforcing them against dissenters? How many of our lawmakers are Catholics? It is the dominant party run by Protestant priests that is responsible for the treason to the republic already installed and that which is brewing. Bear that in mind, brethren of the Secular church.

MR. EDITOR: We hav taken the paper since Bennett's incarceration, and feel that it is worthy of support by those who love liberty of speech, press, or mails. I hope you will be sustained financially to raise your voice against injustice wherever found. So many Liberals are illiberal, and ever so many are indifferent to our danger. The goddess of Liberty is stabbed upon all sides, and why do not her worshipers fly to her defense? If ever the times demanded true women and brave men, it is now. No Freethinker is safe from persecution. And when I think of those our brothers who are in "durance vile" because they dare to speak or print their honest thought hoping to benefit the race, my heart is full of indignation, and I wonder how such things can be in our free country. But we are not free. While we slept, the enemy has sown tares. While in fancied security we were not watchful, the ecclesiastical power has fastened its venomous fangs into the nation's life. How shall we be free? How shall we rouse the great army of lovers of liberty so that unitedly they may strike the destroyer of their dearest rights—so that all may hav their constitutional rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness? Strange that people cannot be free to hav ideas on reform, even if they should happen to be alone in their theory. Each of all the great inventions which now so bless the world was once held by one individual, and if before each was made practical it was revealed to others, why, all men would hav thought the inventor insane and needing to be confined for his own good. We all need "room to grow," and especially should no one be punished or confined unless it is proved that they intend to injure some one, or do injure some one.

Has not the obscenity law done enough violence to honest, honorable people, and is it not apparent enough that it is only used to oppress the social reformers and to crush out Freethought literature, instead of suppressing the really obscene? Is this not so evident that we should raise a protest, and work for repeal of the obnoxious, unconstitutional law? I know it is a delicate subject. I should not want to raise the floodgate of the really obscene, and we might be misunderstood. But I will say that only through investigation of these subjects by the noble and true reformer, by the very ones who are now persecuted as obscenists, will the world ever reach a higher plane of life than the present. I wish I could believe that Comstock really desires to make the world better, purer, or more moral. Then I could pity his mistaken zeal.

Let us reformers be earnest in our work, tolerant of differences, and ever hopeful for the future. S. S. ROOKHILL.

MR. EDITOR: There appears to be great diversity of opinion in regard to Mr. Heywood among THE TRUTH SEEKER's writers, and it is natural that there should be among Liberals, for each one is a god in him or herself. They are not molded in the same mold as the Christians are, so each one has a perfect right to establish a standard of morality for himself. I hav no right to force my standard of God upon you, nor you hav no right to compel me to accept your standard of morals, or religious belief or disbelief, but each of us ought to hav the right to express our opinion as to the merits of our god.

But the Christian and the Christian government do not say so. They say: "You must come to my idols which I hav set up. If not, we will compel you to work for us at hard labor for a time and times and half a time, just as our Christian judges see fit." Christians ought to know by this time that compulsion will not gain one true convert to their standard; they hav tried it long and hard ever since the burning of witches in Salem, this state, up to the incarcerating of Mr. Heywood in the Massachusetts prison.

I called last Saturday to see him, but could not. I asked if I could send him in a newspaper. I was asked what paper. "It is a Radical paper, the New York TRUTH SEEKER." With a very distinct but gentlemanly shrug of the shoulders the answer came promptly: "Oh, no, there is a list of papers and magazines allowed." So Mr. Russel (warden?) handed me a list, which I will forward to you so you can see that THE TRUTH SEEKER fails to show up. I called to see if there was any way in which I could serve him, in the matter of petitions or otherwise. I do not personally agree with Mr. Heywood's plan of conducting his paper, but I would fight for the right he has to conduct it so, and if there is any paper to sign for his holiness the president of this gloriously free United States to extend his pardoning power I will do all I can to get signers to hav him released from that fearful punishment, more unjust than purgatory, for there the priest will get him out for a small amount of filthy lucre.

I hope Heston will soon get better, for THE TRUTH SEEKER looks bare, and certainly will be sat upon by Mr. Comstock in a short time for not having its fine clothes on. I would like the cartoon book, but must hav the new illustrated Bible when published. I am, as ever,

Yours for free press, free mails, and free speech,

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Aug. 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: It almost knocked the enthusiasm out of us for the People's party of Kansas upon reading the preamble to their platform. Here it is: "The People's party of Kansas in delegate convention assembled, recognize almighty God as the rightful sovereign of nations, from whom all just powers of government are derived, and to whose will all human enactments ought to conform." That was as much as we read until three days later. It took all that time to digest it. It fell on us like a wet blanket. We came very near not reviving in time to vote for that party in November. But upon reading the rest of the platform we could not find anything to take exception to, and as the above was not included in the demands we looked upon it as a mere form (which, it is needless to tell you, we did not like) allowed in order to catch the Prohibition vote. The pretext of the Prohibitionists is Prohibition, but their real object is to get God in the Constitution. We are unable to say whether they captured the convention to that extent, or it was thrown out to them as a sop to catch their vote. Be that as it may, the People's party came near losing more than it will gain, because, judging by the numerous Liberals we know who are unanimous in favor of the People's party, or were, I will wager a new hat that they outnumber the out and out Prohibitionist two to one. I know whereof I speak, having been among both elements pretty extensivly—in fact, among all elements, as an agent—and I thought to myself, "Don't giv up the ship." And as all Liberals that know me know I hav carried the day against all opposition when Liberals themselvs hav counseled me that there could be nothing done, I think my judgment is at least entitled to some weight. Therefore, I would counsel the brethren to stick to them, "if it takes all summer," for the following reason: With the People's party we stand on neutral ground and are not asking one another to "come over to our party," but are all agreeing to go over to a new party, and the only way we can hav any influence on parties or legislation is to vote or act in a body. And if all will see to it, from this on we can even repair much that has been lost in this campaign. The most of the representativs and senators to the state legislature are to be chosen yet. And the people want to see to it that they choose fair-minded men as delegates. So we say, do not leave the People's party on a mere trifle, but try and hold any religious encroachment in check. Say to them virtually, We do not wish to force our views upon this party, but we would warn all whom it may concern that they must not try and enforce theirs, so they had better heed the Golden Rule. In our sub-alliance the Liberal element predominates so much that the religious people positivly refuse to furnish a chaplain, so your humble servant and an Infidel lady were competitors for that office, and she was elected. The religious class say virtually that they are not a-going to pray to a set of Infidels. We keep giving out Liberal papers and the People's party papers, all we can get hold of.

We wish to notice the above preamble briefly. It says we "recognize almighty God as the rightful sovereign of nations." When applied to a monarchy it makes him king. Perhaps those nations think it very kind for a mere handful of self-righteous people of this country to select their sovereign. When applied to a republic or this country we might exclaim, "Behold, God has become as one of us;" and as we believe in popular sovereignty, if he will take up his residence in one of the states and remain there a sufficient time to become a legal voter, we will not challenge him on the ground that this government was of the people, by the people, and for the people. So when we come to think the matter over seriously, this was not as big an objection as we first thought it was.

I agree with Sister Elmina and Dr. Severance that before a person is convicted on any charge it ought to be proved that he has injured somebody in person or property, and that folks should not leave it to a modern Inquisition to assume. I hav not as good an opinion of judges as some. I look upon them as time-servers who cannot arise above the ignorance of the time, as in the good old days of slavery and witchcraft. I said, "modern Inquisition," because when any government allows any society to organize for the suppression of anything it can be excusable only, as you said, Mr. Editor, "out on the frontier for the suppression of horsethieves." And that is quite a different case altogether. It would be a very easy matter to prove that somebody had been injured for every horse that was stolen.

There is quite a difference between the injured person prosecuting a case and a self-constituted agent who has become hardened to the business, and has no feeling for the victims or their families, doing so.

Just as sure as Torquemada was an inquisitor-general, so is Anthony Comstock. The only difference is in degree, and not in fact. And whenever any government allows a little government organized within it for the very purpose that the government is organized for, it becomes an Inquisition. And so Anthony Comstock ought to be suppressed.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

PORTLAND, ORE., Aug. 17, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: My letter is on some reasons why I am not a Spiritualist, or the proper way to convert a "cold Materialist."

First, I do not know what a spirit is, if it be an entity or possess an individuality, and yet is not matter. And second, if it be matter, or substance, what are its chemical elements? Or why can it not be examined the same as other substances are examined and tested by the same rules? I know that both of the above positions are taken by Spiritualists thus: they reply that spirit is matter, and yet say it is immaterial. And that is done, too, by the same Spiritualist, as the exigencies of debate seem to demand.

Now, that appears to me to be illogical and unfair, to say that a spirit is "life itself; life, or living substance, considered independently of corporeal existence; the intelligent, immaterial, and immortal part of man; the soul." The above is a part of the definition given of spirit in Webster's Practical Dictionary. I would hav given the definition in full, but it is too long, and does not change it, nor is it more contradictory. And it is the same definition I should get from every Spiritualist that I remember to hav talked with. And nothing that I can conceive of can be more contradictory than to call life a "living substance." If it is proper to call motion a substance, I must say it is one of those things that seem to me contradictory, and therefore a false premis; not an axiom, which is a self-evident truth, but a sophistry which on close examination turns out to be an illusion hid under a vast number of words joined with consummate skill with the intent to deceive. And yet it seems to me that motion bears the same relation to matter that life does to substance or matter. I think I hear some one ask if I believe life and motion to be the same. I reply, it is impossible for me to conceive of life without motion, and yet it is a question if all motion be life. Because life without volition is almost inconceivable. And it is almost equally absurd to say that everything thinks and wills before acting or moving. And it appears more absurd to me to say something moves or thinks which "has neither body or parts" (or is not matter); and therefore does not exist except in imagination. Motion does not exist as an entity. So, then, if life be motion it is not matter. But according to modern discovery no energy is ever lost. There are so many foot pounds stored or expended, but never lost; and like matter, force is indestructible. Then how can life or mind move or act where there is no matter to act upon or through? It seems like folly to talk so. Yet thousands do talk so, while others see the inconsistency and take the other horn of the dilemma and assert that spirit is matter and therefore an entity. Now, it is rulable and reasonable to expect those who make assertions to be willing and able to prove them. Or in other words, on the affirmativ rests the burden of proof. But so far as I hav examined they do not prove either that, or that there is such a thing as a spirit.

But I hav had proof enough that some mediums try to cheat you when you are trying to investigate. However, I may be convinced that I am mistaken. At least, I hav the assurance of a good Spiritualist that I shall be a Spiritualist soon. And at the same time he requested that the Spiritualists pray to the spirits to assist in converting me, and one has offered to pay for a seance which he is sure will convince me that Materialism is a delusion.

Now, all of this is quite satisfactory to me, for if Spiritualism is true I want to know it, and if it is not true I am sure prayers to the spirits—which do not exist—for them to assist in converting me, can never be answered.

But the above are not all nor the principal reasons why I am not a Spiritualist. And right here I wish to state that the reason assigned by Spiritualists why I am not one was because I am not willing to be one even if it is true. I deny that charge and say no one is better qualified to tell what I believe, or why I believe as I do, than I myself. And furthermore, I am not such a liar as to say I believe a thing when I do not. But the principal reason why I am not a Spiritualist is because I hav never got a message from beyond the grave, from any of my former friends or relativs, of such a nature as to prove Spiritualism a possibility, much less a probability. And yet I hav thrown myself open for evidence on all occasions, and do still, but I hav very faint hope after many failures to get evidence. On the other hand, I hav received messages purporting to be from spirits which proved beyond a doubt that there was fraud. And since telling good stories is almost the only means used to convert me, I hope I shall be permitted to relate one or two. I had been visiting the Spiritual meetings here about six months, and made no secret of my Materialism, when one of the mediums was answering mental questions one Sunday about a year ago. And I asked (mentally) how old my father was when he died. I received some general remarks from the medium and I told him that did not answer my mental question. The medium flew in a rage in the presence of the audience, and said I was altogether too positiv to get a communication and I made it impossible for spirits to communicate with me. He said this in an angry, excited tone. I disguised my feelings, which were somewhat excited by his manner, and replied slowly in a low tone, "All right." He seemed pacified in part and remarked that if I was not so positiv I might get something of value from the spirits. I was very anxious to get something of value, so I dissimulated a little and replied in as subdued a tone as I was master of, "All right." The medium said, "If you will put your question in a proper spirit and not so positiv a manner, perhaps the spirits will come around to you and answer you." I replied, sotto voce, "All right." Well, the medium came to me last and asked me to present my question in a proper manner. It is wonderful what deference those spirits require. I presented the same question in the most approved style, with my right hand raised, as directed by the medium. He looked at me in a dazed manner and remarked that it appeared like a fog around me and he could hardly make out the answer to my question, but was under the impression the answer was "Yes." I smiled when he said, "Yes, that is the right answer to your question." I waited till the medium took his seat, when I remarked for the benefit of the audience, and spirits, if any were present, that my question was, "How old was my father when he died?" and I got for a reply, "I think the answer is yes; yes, that is the correct answer to your question." Several in the audience showed signs of anger, especially the medium's wife, who said, "Spirits never answer such foolish questions." A gentleman from California asked, why did they try to answer this one?

Another Sunday I was taken to a private sitting (they are always the best) and had communications purporting to be from some spirit whose first name was William, and another from my father, and another from my mother. Now, to make sure that it was my father's and mother's spirits that were talking to me I asked the privilege of presenting a half-dozen questions, which was granted, when I presented the following: What was the name of my father? and mother? How old was each when they died? And at what dates did they die? The purported spirits said that the name of my mother was Sarah, and that is the only question of the six they tried to answer. And my mother's name is not and never was Sarah, and she is still alive (or was a few weeks ago), in Connecticut.

Now, the reason I am not a Spiritualist is because I don't get the right answers to my questions. The way to convert me is to produce the proof, and not tell big stories of what you saw.

G. F. ELLIOTT.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Aug. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: My attention has been called to an article in your paper of August 9th, written by John P. Guild. I see he has attempted to criticise some statements I made in my pamphlet, "Death Ends All." By your permission, I would like to reply to him.

He says: "I do not know why that proposition is not as dogmatic as the contradiction." It seems Friend Guild has not carefully read pages 5-8 of my pamphlet, or if he did he did not understand the import. The reason why the statement, "Death ends all," is not dogmatic at all, is because nature has shown me, and many others, thousands of times, that consciousness is not eternal. My consciousness has become extinct seven different times by accident and disease, besides many thousands of times in sleep—just as dead for short intervals of time as it was through all the eternity of time that passed before I was organized.

I am simply stating the facts—not giving an opinion—by which nature proves that all statements about the eternity of consciousness are as false as they are dogmatic.

Mr. Guild says: "How is one to know whether death ends all unless he has knowledge when he is dead?" I answer: Just as we know when our consciousness has been dead by sleep, or any other cause, and become conscious again, and this is the very condition we hav to be in to know anything. The very simple fact that Mr. Guild was unconscious during all that part of eternity that passed before he was born, is all that is necessary to prove all claims of the eternity of consciousness to be false.

If it can be proved that consciousness existed in any case antecedent to the existence of a brain and its chemical action, then a case is made out, not before.

When I use the word "consciousness," I mean all its qualities, such as seeing, hearing, smelling, tasting, feeling, thinking, and knowing. These were all, not relativly or in a degree, but absolutely, dead in my own case, spoken of in my pamphlet, and my consciousness neither lived in this or any other world during the intervals referred to. There is certainly nothing about me that is eternally conscious, and if Friend Guild possesses any such attribute, he must refrain from sleep altogether.

The brain works in parts, and one part can be out of order while the other performs its normal functions. It is so with the nerves. One side of a man may be paralyzed, the other healthy. That is why the conscious part of the brain can be asleep while the unconscious part is activ; and it is this that restores to consciousness the former, the modus operandi of which is fully explained in my pamphlet, on pages 7 and 8. If we possessed souls that were eternally conscious, then we never could be unconscious for an instant; for a thing that is eternal can neither be created nor annihilated, and my consciousness both begins and is annihilated every morning and evening. How is it with Friend Guild?

Again he says: "Vegetable and animal life we see continually transformed into each other. How do we know how many other modes there may be of living?" I answer: by watching the operations of nature. For instance, if a lion were to eat my brain to-night, it would soon transform the substance into lion's blood and lion's brain, so it would not be my brain any longer. The term brain is only used to indicate a certain condition in which matter exists, and as matter changes its condition of existence it changes its properties, so it could not produce conscious thought (unless it should appear anew as conscious cerebration in the lion), for the principle of structure and its form is in every way changed. Or suppose I eat some sheep's brains, then I transform their substance into my blood and brains, and then my brain by chemical decomposition is transformed into my conscious thought and force; but the sheep's consciousness no longer exists. When the organized form of the sheep's brain is destroyed, its consciousness and ability to produce thought is annihilated, its individuality ceases. So with us, whether we are absorbed by vegetables or other animals. These are patent facts, knowable and demonstrable, and what we may think to the contrary does not change them.

When I assert that the stoppage of the decomposition of the cerebrum stops the production of conscious thought and force, I only report what nature has revealed to me by actual experience.

This is not "the religious or mystical method of procedure" to which Mr. Guild refers, but in strict accordance with the scientific method.

If Friend Guild is not satisfied with ordinary sleep, let him take an anesthetic and hav a surgical operation performed while perfectly unconscious. He will then, perhaps, understand that perpetual anesthesia is eternal death. And the fact that "death ends all" individuality is just as knowable as any other fact of nature.

A young man in this city, an inspector of arc lights, received an electric shock and fell some ten feet to the ground, cutting a hole in the back of his head, and remaining unconscious for many hours. After his recovery he said to me: "They can all say what they like, but death by electricity is entirely painless. Had I never recovered, I should never hav known anything about it." Now, this man's statement is a complete answer to Mr. Guild's criticism about "knowledge when he is dead." He did not, of course, possess consciousness while he was dead, but when consciousness returned he knew that he had been dead. Although the man was unconscious, yet the cerebellum was still in working order and generated an electric current, sending it down the nerves to contract the muscles of the heart, diaphragm, and stomach, making blood and circulating it through the cerebrum, restoring its composition and structure, rendering it capable of responding to external impressions, which results in its decomposition and the generation of conscious thought.

The composition of the cerebrum is similar to dynamite. Its decomposition is started by vibrations, or percussion, and whether thoughts are exceedingly fine atoms of brain matter possessing the property of consciousness while they exist in that particular form or not, it is a positiv fact that we hav had thousands of thoughts that we do not hav now, all of which had both a beginning and an end—hence not one of them is eternal.

Again I quote: "Life and death are alike mysteries; all we know of either is by natural revelation." True; that is the only way we know anything. But just in proportion as people do not heed nature's revelations will life and death and everything else be "mysteries."

I do not care to discuss the testimony of "the multitudes" referred to by Friend Guild further than to say that I regard Spiritualism as a species of emotional insanity, or another name for Christianity, modified.

"What can any negativ argument amount to to us, anyway?" I suppose Friend Guild believes in the resurrection of the body and an eternal hell, as "negativ evidence" does not amount to anything.

"Mr. Hague's book is a short and unpretentious summary of the usual arguments for the no-soul, no-future-life theory." Excuse me. I am not dealing in "theories" or guess-work. I simply state the cold facts in the case in an unpretentious way, and if Mr. Guild cannot see their force and significance, it is to be hoped that others may.

As to my "inaccuracies," I shall be obliged to anyone who will point them out.

Mr. Guild's "too too-too" paragraph may be witty, but it is neither just nor generous. My language is not only misquoted but disconnected from its context and distorted. I do not ask critics to be generous, but I hav a right to demand fair treatment.

"How did the part become conscious? That is the question before the senate." Not the question, but only one of the questions incidental to the main one, "Does death end all?" I hav answered it in detail on pages 5, 9, 10, 18, 20, 25, 26, and 28 of my pamphlet, and I will now briefly answer it here. The part "becomes conscious" by the chemical decomposition and transformation of the cell substance of the cerebrum. If Mr. Guild can prove that thought, or consciousness, is evolved by any other process, "the senate" will listen to him.

In conclusion, I am a plain man, and wrote my book in plain language for plain people (as stated in the preface), and to promote the welfare of my fellow-toilers by freeing them from the sycophantic hope of heaven and slavish fear of hell. But it seems that the dilletanti either cannot or will not understand me. I hope Mr. Guild will re-read my book with a view to get at the meat in it, and then out of a pure sense of justice write a more correct criticism.

Yours truly, WALTER HAGUE.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Jed.

"Jed was bad, thoroughly bad;"
That's what everyone said of the lad.
Bnt coming to me in trouble one day,
And questioning somewhat out of my way
With neighborly manner, carefully wise,
The kind words wrung the tears from his eyes.
He felt "condemned in the sight of men,
Expecting the sheriff even then;"
And "nobody cared, as they never had,"
He had "always been so hopelessly bad
And would pay the world in its own wild strokes
Were it not for 'them,' the two old folks."

"Jed was bad, wretchedly bad;"
Should he then "move on," starving and sad?
And out of my pity came thoughts of my own
While he talked of "the folks" in a softened tone.
Thus I found the thrum of a silvery thread
Unrav'ling the heart of this human Jed;
And saying on in a woman's way,
I begged he'd begin anew that day;
His mother would be of friends the friend
(I kept fast hold of that thrum's true end);
Her love would last as the mighty oaks;
He promised to stay with the "two old folks."

Jed so "bad, viciously bad,"
Is the old opinion the world has had Ever since the morn of the race began
Of youth and maiden, woman or man,
Should they in a luckless moment forget
The argus-eyes of this martinet;
And summing it up the bad with the good
Hinting to Jed of a grand selfhood,
While he in a voice trembling and low
Was "sorry he'd grieved his mother so,"
He yet would outliv the world's rough jokes
And provide in time for the "two old folks."

Though "Jed was bad, heinously bad,"
I found honor and worth in the lad
When he remarked that "the way to do
Was to care for those who had cared for you;"
And it was "wrong, as many had done,
To hav the parents stay with the son,"
But, turning the tables, this fearful Jed
Should soon be "staying with them instead,
And the house should be theirs," and this pleased me so
I deemed it something the others should know,
And notwithstanding the unkind croaks
He is building a home for his "two old folks."

Little Boy Blue.

Under the haystack little Boy Blue
Sleeps with his head on his arm,
While voices of men and voices of maids
Are calling him over the farm.

Sheep in the meadows are running wild
Where the poisonous herbage grows,
Leaving white tufts of downy fleece
On the thorns of the sweet wild rose.

Out in the fields where the silken corn
Its plumed head nods and blows,
Where golden pumpkins ripen below,
Trample the whitefaced cows.

But no loud blast on the shining horn
Calls back the straying sheep,
And the cows may wander in hay and corn
While the keeper lies asleep.

His roguish eyes are tightly shut,
His dimples are all at rest;
The chubby hand, tucked under the head,
By one rosy cheek is pressed.

Wake him? No! Let down the bars
And gather the truant sheep;
Open the barnyard and drive in the cows,
But let the little boy sleep

For year after year we can shear the fleece,
And corn can always be sown;
And the sleep that visits little Boy Blue
Will not come when the years hav flown.

ENCOURAGE CHILDREN.

No one was ever made better by carping, scolding, or fault-finding. Boys are boys and girls are girls. They are not men and women. They hav not had experience in living. Life is a new and untried road to them. They inevitably make mistakes. It cannot be helped. Be reasonable with them. Be patient. Are they willful, wild, careless, negligent? Try to find the cause of all shortcomings. It is oftener in the parent than otherwise. We inherit good and bad qualities. Constant reproof does not always mend matters. A gentle word, a smile in place of a frown, a "try and do better next time," often do wonders.

A little word in kindness spoken,
A motion or a tear,
Has often healed a heart that's broken,
And made a friend sincere.

No one is beyond redemption. Take the story of "Jed," as noticed in another column. Kindness and appreciation will make a man of him. As Mrs. Finch says, "Many are made outcasts by the cry of mad dog," etc. For our part we like "bad boys," so called. They usually, with the right kind of treatment, turn out to be good men.

Giv all the encouragement possible. Talk to children. Reason with them. Show them the right way and walk therein yourself. Example is better than precept. S. H. W.

MY RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE. BY S. P. PUTNAM.

This is more interesting than some novels. It fascinates by its glowing language, its bright, pithy sentences. Mr. Putnam has certainly had a "change of heart." He knows what it is to be "born again." He has been converted as much as anybody ever was in this world. But this "converted Infidel" accounts for the finding of sweet peace and comfort in a very philosophical manner. He explains the whole thing, and shows conclusivly that there is no mystery or miracle about it.

Philosophy, science, altruism, Universology, criticism of men and methods, are seasonably served in this book of experiences by the author in his own unique and pleasing style.

Although the book has only been issued a short time, the first edition is already exhausted, and many more editions will doubtless follow, as everyone will want to read what the brilliant author and lecturer of the Pacific has to say of his religious career. The pages number 100, and the price is only 25 cents.

WHAT WOULD FOLLOW ON THE EFFACEMENT OF CHRISTIANITY. BY GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

This is fine reading. Mr. Holyoake tells in a clear, comprehensiv, and straightforward manner just what might be expected if superstition were blotted from the earth. People left to the exercise of their own reason would be reasonable, unfettered by the gyves and yokes of barbarous dogmas and beliefs in a vindictiv deity. Men would rise and soar aloft in mental liberty, would become larger, nobler, truer, in every way. A fine portrait of Mr. Holyoake adorns the outer covering of this pamphlet, which is published by H. L. Green and is offered at the low price of 10 cents per copy.

THE GODS. BY ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Everyone will be pleased that H. L. Green has put into pamphlet form Colonel Ingersoll's masterly oration on "The Gods." This pamphlet is a household necessity. It can not be read too often. Every page gleams and glistens with the jewels of eloquent thought. Like all that our great leader says, it throbs with rational philosophy.

It sells for 20 cents, and can be procured, together with the books mentioned above, at the TRUTH SEEKER office.—ED. C. C.

A Kitten's Friendship.

An interesting sight was seen on Bedford street Saturday morning which proves that dumb animals know the difference between friends and enemies, and that they can pick out from the younger members of the human family those whom they are willing to meet on terms of companionship. There belongs in one of the offices a young kitten. He is as black as midnight, and has not a hair on his body of any other hue. His owners think a great deal of him, although he is not yet more than half-grown, and they hav provided him with a leather and nickel collar. In the morning the young feline likes to sit on the front steps enjoying the fresh air. He always keeps a bright lookout for dogs and hoodlum boys, and can retreat in an excellent order to the rear of the office at two seconds' notice.

A little girl aged about four years came strolling down the street. Her parents, evidently, had hard work to make both ends meet, if the child's clothing was an indication. She was barefooted, and on her head was a little torn straw hat. Her clothes were very much in need of laundrying, but the little one cared not for that apparently. She was happy and had nothing on her mind, except to enjoy herself in her childish way. The black kitten was on the front steps, and it caught her eye. She stopped and said, "Hello, kitty!" The cat scrutinized his little admirer, and was evidently favorable to the child, who sat down and patted the head of the cat, and talked to it as she would to a playmate. The cat rubbed his head against the little one's elbow, and purred very pleasantly. Then he walked on her lap and sat down very comfortably, folding his front paws as if he were going to stay there for some time. The pair were getting along very pleasantly, when a small brindle bulldog came down the street reconnoitering. As he reached the place where the kitten was, the fur on the latter's back was elevated somewhat. But the kitten seemed to think he had a protector, although the bulldog curled his upper lip, as he stopped gazing at the pair. The little girl rose to the occasion and lisped, "Go way, doggie, don't you bodder my kitty." The dog did go on without molesting his natural enemy, and the kitten settled down to his comfortable seat to be again petted by the little one. But if anyone can tell why the usual bulldog nature did not assert itself in this case we should like to know the reason. Ordinarily a young bulldog would hav attempted "to make the fur fly." It may be that the canine was magnanimous and respected the wishes of the little girl, and it may be that he was hunting larger game. Who can tell?—Fall River Tribune.

[By an unfaltering instinct animals know whom to trust and whom to fear. Some children also possess this faculty in a remarkable degree. The men and women shunned by children are not those whose friendship we should seek. Contact with the world deadens this fine quality of selection, hence we are often deceived by outward appearances. Men and women practice deceit and hypocrisy until the child nature, the higher faculty of keen and correct judgment, is lost or hidden beneath the rubbish of false appearances and mock goodness. The pharisee and the hypocrit are as much alive to-day as when Jesus rebuked them in scathing language two thousand years ago.

"I am holier than thou" is written on the faces, or expressed in action, by every fawning sycophant that bows to wealth and cringes before a popular sentiment, while passing by the plain, unvarnished truth as it appears in its honest guise of simple facts.

Thoreau fled from human society and its disgraceful shams, and found a sweet and beautiful companionship among the animals and insects, who neither lie nor deceive. Looking upon communities with all their contemptible deceptions and falsehoods, who can blame him?

We may all learn a lesson from the kindly-natured kitten in the little sketch above, the brindle dog who restrained his natural inclination, and the true-hearted little waif, whose unaffected act of kindness is like the ripple of a silvery wave on a black and stormy ocean.

We should try to liv nearer to Nature, nearer to the great heart of Truth and Charity.—ED. C. C.]

Correspondence.

DORA, MO., Aug. 25, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I hav not seen any letters from this place, I thought I would write one. My papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER a number of years. I hav one of your books, "The Story Hour." At school I study grammar, writing, history, geography, spelling, arithmetic, and physiology. I liv in the country, and am thirteen years old.

CHAS. A. FISCHER.

SHERMAN, MICH., Aug. 27, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As you published my other letter, I will write again.

We liv four miles from the village of Sherman. It is not a very large place.

The country around here is rather hilly, but it is pleasant. We liv on a rather steep hill-top.

I hav a mile to go to school. Our school begins three weeks from to-day.

We hav plenty of rain this summer. It is raining now, and everything looks well.

I would like to ask you a question in history: What was the population of the United States in 1870 [33,923,210]?

Well, I guess I hav written enough; but I must tell you my name is not Anna, but Aura. My real name is Aurora, but my people call me Aura for short.

Your true friend, AURORA SOUTHWICK.

[Perhaps the following was intended for a private letter, but we take the liberty to print it for the fine compliment to our esteemed friend and co-worker, Geo. J. Remsburg.—ED. C. C.]

CLEARWATER, NEB., Aug. 12, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav not written in so long a time that it seems almost like neglect, but you know how to excuse an invalid who finds a mountain of work confronting her when still unable to do much.

I inclose two poems for the Children's Corner. The one of "Jed" was suggested by a true incident. The boy now is steady and trying to get a home for the father and mother and little sister. He said he meant to and I encouraged him all I could when I found how much he thought of his mother. Many boys are made outcasts by the cry of "mad dog" and everybody's hand being against them.

I am happy to see such improvement in the Corner and wish to thank all the writers young and old, who help to make it entertaining. Geo. Remsburg is almost better than a "chip of the old block"—he is the block itself. I was glad to hear of his song being set to music by an English publisher. The older writers will hav to look well to their laurels. He is bound to make his mark on the top round of the ladder of fame. Success to him and all who try to win. Fraternally yours, MARY B. FINCH.

News of the Week.

THERE is destitution and suffering at Oklahoma.

REV. WM. EDGELL, of Brownston, W. Va., has been arrested for forging pension affidavits.

FLOODS hav rendered destitute forty-five thousand persons of the city of Prague, Austria.

IT is reported from Texas that that state has eight hundred murders a year, while a jury rarely has manhood enough to convict one of the perpetrators.

HARRY FAYE, fifteen years old, who died at Brooklyn on the 30th ult., was kept without medical aid by his parents, who believe in Faith Cure, till it was too late.

THE employees of the British admiralty, war office, and post-office hav begun the formation of a union of government workmen for strike and other purposes.

IN view of Blaine's proposal of free trade with all American nations that will reciprocate, it is considered that the Republican party has modified its protection policy.

AT St. Matthew's German Lutheran church at Hoboken, N. J., last Sunday, a conflict as to who should occupy the pulpit was waged with barricades and other applications of force.

THE Farmers' Alliance of Missouri, which expects to control the next legislature, will devote itself mainly to economizing government and reducing the taxes which it says are ruining agriculturists.

AT Allegheny City, Pa., a German flag was carried in a Labor day parade, and some American mechanics seized and destroyed it, inflicting considerable violence on the paraders and a policeman who defended it.

THE Rev. S. R. Shrieves has been conducting a big camp-meeting at Moss Run, O., accompanied by an alleged wife, but there has appeared on the scene his real wife, whom he deserted six years ago with two children.

THE scheme of bridging the English Channel has gone so far that plans hav been drawn and soundings made, and a special commission has been appointed by the French minister of public works to inquire into the project.

THE Catholic congress at Coblentz, Germany, attended by six thousand delegates, demands the reëstablishment in Germany of all the ecclesiastical orders, including the Jesuits, and the restoration of the pope's temporal power.

AT Mountain Springs, Tex., a Baptist deacon recently went to the house of Mrs. Solby and finding her family absent called her "dear sister" and began taking liberties with her. She defended herself, and has had him arrested for assault.

A PROPOSITION has been submitted to the emperor of Germany to introduce the system of phonetic orthography for the German language. His Majesty has referred the matter to the ministry of public instruction, with orders that the whole question shall be fully considered.

THE New York Central strike has failed. Train-wreckers derailed a Montreal express near Greenbush, N. Y., on the night of the 4th, but by luck no one was injured. The Knights deny that it was the work of one of them, but Manager Webb says no mere sympathizer would hav taken the pains which this wrecking device displayed.

THE statistics of Canadian and American pilgrims to the shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre, Canada, are: 1888, 91,347; 1889, 100,951; 1890, January, 400; February, 350; March, 1,110; April, 500; May, 1,390; June, 9,267; July 1st to 22d, 30,690. The proportion this year is much larger than last, and the profits of this scene of miracles and divine cures are attaining great magnitude.

THE animosity between Mohammedans and Christians in the neighborhood of Turkey continues to be marked with acts of violence. It is reported by observers that "it would be easy to start a religious war in eastern Europe, where civilization is at a low ebb, and fanaticism is rampant, and where for centuries all sorts of oppression for conscience's sake hav been perpetrated."

MRS. MARIA WOODWORTH, a female revivalist, at her tent in St. Louis is driving many persons into frenzy, neglect of their every-day duties, and insanity. Her uncommon powers are thought to partake of hypnotism by physicians, who also think that she is insane and should be confined. Her influence is mainly over a class known to physicians as neurotics, or persons peculiarly subject to mental disease.

OTTO LEUTH and Brocky Smith were hanged at Columbus a few days ago. The boy Leuth murdered little Maggie Thompson, nine years old, by luring her into his house and beating her on the head with a hammer. Smith was a worthless fellow who murdered an inoffensiv old lady because she refused him her money. Leuth was prepared for heaven by a Lutheran minister; Smith was guaranteed eternal bliss by a Catholic priest.

The Church of Practical Religion.
BY REPORTER.

This is the history of an attempt to found a church without superstition, and its success. Uncle Job Sawyer, the pastor, having established his pulpit, uses it to discuss all the vital questions of human concern, religious, political, and otherwise. The book is written in well-chosen language, and easily understood. There is just sufficient narrativ about it to interest the reader and hold his attention while the truth is being brought to his mind.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S "Children's Corner," MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, has been elected senior member of the School Board of Fall River, Mass.

The Truth Seeker Gives all the News of Freethought, and is Always on Guard Against the Encroachments of Ecclesiastics upon the People's Liberties.

If you have any Ideas or Reforms calculated to benefit humanity write to THE TRUTH SEEKER (sending your subscription) and let the world know of them. THE TRUTH SEEKER publishes each week more letters from the people than any other paper in the world.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is devoted to the defense of Mental Liberty, of American Institutions, and the Preservation of the United States Constitution, so far as regards religious tests, and the maintenance of human rights. It advocates the abolition of all laws based on religion or religious observances. It demands the taxation of church property. It is uncompromisingly opposed to anything tending toward a union of church and state, either in name or in fact.

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indiscretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT. "Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address,

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second, that he fulfills all his agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would hav been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS states the true wisdom for both parties on the negro question in the terse saying: "Let us alone and giv us fair play."

COLONEL WATTERSON, of the Louisville Courier-Journal, is authority for the statement that there was a time when Prohibition was complete in Kentucky, but it was in the very early days when the entire state was five thousand feet under the sea.

THE World thinks the Metropolitan Museum of Art would greatly increase its service to the community if it were open on Sunday. The visitors to the similar institution in Boston are twice as numerous on Sunday as on other days, and equally orderly and interested.

WHO says the church is indifferent to the affairs of every-day life? In England the clergy pointedly condemn the fashionable tilted-elbow style of hand-shaking, and the bishop of Chester considers the matter of sufficient importance to justify him in scathing the custom in a public address.

IN the French chamber of deputies, M. Forcioli has brought forward a bill modifying the French form of oath. M. Forcioli proposes to omit the words, "Before God and before men," and substitute, "On my honor and conscience I swear." He also proposes that all religious emblems shall be removed from the tribunals.

THE heartsease or pansy (French, la pensée) is used in France as the symbol of Freethought. It was used as the sign of reunion at the International Conference at Paris last September. We see from La Vérité that it will be proposed to the International Federation of Freethinkers, by the French Federation, that this flower shall become the universal emblem of Freethought.

KANSAS continues its efforts to be the most virtuous community between sun-up and due west. The police marshal of Leavenworth threatens to arrest for gambling the persons who play progressiv eucher. "It is believed," says a Leavenworth dispatch, "that police raids will not be attempted, but that the marshal will obtain a list of guests at eucher parties and serve warrants on them individually the day following." When you once go into the prohibition business, comments the Sun, there is no telling where you will bring up, if you are logical.

"I HAV made a discovery," said Colonel Glenn this morning. "What's that?" "Why, that the most terrible habit a man can hav is the habit of having regular habits. I mean, to get into the habit of doing certain things at certain times, without variation, day in and day out. My idea is that the best way for a man to do is to eat when he is hungry, go to bed when he is sleepy, drink when he is thirsty, no matter when, and so on. I hav also found out that the habit most easily gotten out of is that of going to church." —Atlanta Journal.

THE other day a clergyman got on a West Shore train at Tappan, says George Van Wormer, one of the most popular conductors of that road. The train was crowded, and the clergyman refused to surrender his ticket until he got a seat. Half-jokingly, the conductor suggested to a young lady sitting in the vicinity to giv her seat to the dominie. To his amazement she did so, and to his still greater amazement the clergyman promptly slid into it. The hissing passengers, says the Tribune, soon provided the young lady with a seat, and it is to be hoped that the clergyman felt thoroughly ashamed of himself for his ungallant behavior.

JUDAS has been officially abolished in the island of Madeira. It has been a time-honored custom of the nativs to exhibit in one of their numerous religious processions an effigy of Judas, upon which the opprobrium of the populace was duly heaped, and at the close of the day Judas was burnt with vociferous expressions of triumph and joy. Of late years it has happened that the effigy of Judas has borne a striking resemblance to some person upon whom the general public had ceased to smile, and thus the governor of the island, the mayor of Funchal, and a foreign consul hav been caricatured in the procession and burnt in effigy. The powers that be hav decided that the admixture of politics and religion is not wholesome, and so the edict has gone forth that hereafter the people must get along without Judas.

THE three-year-old son of a certain clergyman came home from church the other Sunday with something puzzling his young soul, relates a Sun writer. He was unusually silent all day and it was not until next day that he appealed for light and help to his elders. At dinner on Monday he broke forth: "Papa, they was two ladies sanged in the choir. One lady had a wail tied back around her head, so [illustrating], and nuther lady had a little bonnet flat down on her ears, so [palms on ears]. One lady sanged 'His name is King,' and nuther lady sanged, 'His name is Lord.' What is his name, papa?" The choir, it appears, had "sanged" an anthem substantially as set forth in the young man's report.

STIFLING the Methodist conscience: "To hav permanent contracts with men to furnish apples and corn for distillation we deem pernicious and objectionable; but to sell apples and corn in the market to those who come and buy them, or to sell apples and corn to those who come along with wagons to buy them, is an ordinary business transaction. If distillers misuse the corn and apples, it is not because these things are fit only for the evil use they make of them; they are responsible for that. Some years ago a butcher refused to sell meat to a rum seller on the ground that the rumseller was in an evil business, that he devoted all the strength he could obtain to the vigorous prosecution of that evil business, the meat he ate gave him the strength, and therefore he, as an honest men hating that business, could not sell him meat by which to strengthen himself to carry it on. The logic of such persons would impeach the almighty, the source of all strength."—Christian Advocate.

ON a recent Sunday, a party of young men, of the city of Washington, were playing ball outside of hearing distance from any dwelling, but were arrested by the police, on the strength of the common-law decision, recently issued by the commissioners, that ball playing on Sunday is contrary to the Christian religion, and that the Christian religion is a part of the common law, and, consequently, of the law of the District of Columbia. When the case was brought to trial, the court and prosecuting attorney ignored the legal lore of the commissioners, and tried the case under an ordinance prohibiting the playing of ball in streets, avenues, and alleys. The counsel for the ball players argued that the law had not been violated, although he attempted to placate the court by acknowledging that the young men might better hav been in church. The policeman thought that they were playing on a line with the extension of Seventeenth street; the judge therefore held that they were playing in the streets, and imposed a fine of $5.

THE main difference between Agnosticism and Atheism, says Secular Thought, is one of philosophy. The Atheist believes in one known existence, the universe. This he assumes to be infinit—i.e., indefinit. He rejects all existence beyond the known, but does not deny the possibility of further advances in knowledge. The Pantheistic Agnostic, assuming that the pantheos, though unknown in totality, pervades all nature, will probably worship it in some way. But to the Atheist, worship would be illogical, as he believes that it would be merely paid to nature. The Agnostic pure and simple, while he admits for scientific purposes the truth, or assumed truth, of Materialism, rejects that Materialism for searching more deeply into nature. And therein lies one of the chief differences between Atheism and Agnosticism. Whereas the Atheist, as a Monist, believes in but one existence, the Agnostic admits that it is impossible to obtain any certain facts upon the subject. He does not deny the possibility of the truth of either Materialistic Monism (Atheism) or Spiritualistic Monism (Pantheism); but, on the other hand, neither does he deny the possibility of there being two or more existences.

A GREAT conference of Sabbatarians has been called to meet at Chicago next month for the purpose of bringing pressure to bear upon the World's Fair commissioners and securing a decree that the fair shall not be open to the public on Sundays. Apart from the hurtful prematurity of thus springing a question of administrativ detail upon the commissioners three years in advance of the possible opening of the fair, the movement is an effort of intolerance to force the opinions of a part of the community upon an enterprise that belongs to the whole community, says the World. In this free country questions of religious observance belong exclusivly to individual conscience and religious organizations. The state and the public, as such, hav nothing to do with them. The just rule with respect to such observance, in connection with a public enterprise like this World's Fair, is to leave every man to determin his course for himself. Under this rule those who feel that it is wrong to visit the fair on Sunday should remain away; those whose consciences impose no such restrictions upon them will attend. There is no more justice in compelling the one class to stay away than in compelling the other to go. And there would be the gravest injustice in closing the fair on Sunday, because there are many thousands who can visit it on no other day and whose right to visit it is just as good as that of anybody else. The principle of right under a free government is that no man's conscience shall giv law to any other man.

THE Rev. Shirley Baker, sent as a missionary to the Tonga islands, became at length the ruler of the kingdom, but has recently been deposed. The San Francisco Chronicle says: "The deportation of the Rev. Mr. Baker from Tonga ends the career of a South Sea island Bismarck who made the nativ king a puppet and ruled with an iron hand. Baker began as a modest Methodist missionary, but his rare executiv ability soon displayed itself and he was made prime minister by the king. The Wesleyan mission in Tonga was very grasping, and secured large sums of money from the nativs in contributions. This coin was not spent on the islands, and no report of its disposition was ever furnished. Naturally the nativs objected to this draining away of their resources, and it resulted in strained relations between the king and the mission, and ultimately in the formation of a free church. The missionaries at once jumped to the conclusion that Baker was the cause of their trouble, and they so wrought upon some of the nativs who remained faithful that these attacked Baker. He had a narrow escape, but his son and daughter were crippled. Then began a hideous series of reprisals, several nativs being executed and others banished, so that finally the British high commissioner decided that the only way to save the island from civil war was to remove Baker. Such is the evolution of Christianity in the South sea; yet it can be said for Baker that he suppressed drunkenness and did much to improve the condition of the people. If he could hav extinguished the theological rancor of his old associates he would still be in power." It is said the king of Tonga was so overjoyed to get rid of the officious missionary that he held a jubilee, forgave all his enemies, and invited his exiled subjects to return.

SOME rather curious results attend the attempts of pagans nominally converted by missionaries to improve upon the Christian religion. They sometimes make a strange mess with their mixture of vague Christian notions and pagan ideas, if a writer in the Sun is accurate. About twenty-five years ago many of the Maori in New Zealand who were supposed to be Christians invented a new religion. Their leaders asserted that most of the Christian religion was false, but the angel Gabriel and the Virgin Mary were gods who inspired their priests and gave them protection. These personages were about all they retained of the Christian religion. They wanted a medium through which they could communicate with the angel Gabriel, and they therefore cut off the head of an unfortunate white man, and the priests pretended to receive inspiration from Gabriel through this head. Soon after another sect arose on the northern island of New Zealand. Tewhiti, a chief who had grown weary of Christianity as it was taught to him, set up a religion of his own, called himself a prophet, and declared it wicked to read any book but the Bible. He attracted a large party and for considerable time gave the missionaries much trouble with his peculiar teaching of their faith. In the end, however, as he did not regard himself amenable to the law, it was necessary to deal severely with him. He was suppressed by the government, and his religion fell with him. Another sect arose. These people pretended to hav a great reverence for the Bible and spiritual things, but the main purpose of the sect was to indulge in the utmost license under the cloak of religion, and it was necessary for the government to suppress it. In Burma to-day is a curious admixture of Christianity and Buddhism among one of the Karen tribes. The religion has little semblance to Christianity, except that the Christian Sabbath is observed and services held in imitation of those conducted by the missionaries. This form of worship has thousands of adherents, and ignorant people are especially inclined to accept the new teachings. In India, a while ago, the nativs of a district that had embraced Christianity conceived an idea that was identical with that of our Second Adventists. They made up their minds, nobody knows how, that the world was coming to an end on Sept. 29, 1881. It was in vain that their missionaries remonstrated with them. The fanatics declared that the world was surely coming to an end, and a large number of people left their homes and went to the ocean shore, where they awaited the coming of the Lord. They had sold everything they possessed, keeping only money enough to buy food and lodging until the fatal day arrived. Most of their time was spent in fasting, prayer, and exhortation, and there was great excitement when the important day at length dawned. There they were gathered on the beach, and waited all day for the Lord. At nightfall, as he did not appear they finally decided that they had been deceived, and returned to the missionaries greatly humbled and begging forgivness. It is a curious spectacle nowadays to see in Angola, where missionaries nominally converted thousands of the nativs to Christianity two or three centuries ago, the poor people telling their beads and kissing their crucifixes without the slightest idea of the significance Christian people attach to these objects. The meaning of the cross was long ago forgotten by their fathers. All that is left of the old Roman Catholic faith among these nativs are the beads and crucifixes, which they regard simply as a sort of fetich that will keep them from bodily injury. Only this remains of the wonderful Christianizing triumphs of the Romish fathers, who two centuries ago were so proud of reclaiming many thousands of African nativs from paganism.

The Christian's India Rubber God.

The magnitude of some of these stars is far beyond our comprehension. It is estimated that the star Sirius has a diameter fourteen times greater than our sun. The star Lyra would fill the orbit of Neptune, which is 3,600 000 000 of miles in diameter. Bear in mind I hav only been hinting at the number and distances and magnitude of stars in a single cluster, and that the one in which our sun and solar system is placed.

This cluster is shaped something like a huge convex lens, and may be quite well, though not exactly, represented by placing two saucers together so that their concave surfaces may face each other. Now imagin our position under the center of this cluster, and then it will be easy to understand why we see so many stars when we look in the direction represented by the rims of the saucers, corresponding to the Milky Way, and why so few are seen when we look in the direction corresponding to the sides of the saucers. With these few hints, a little reflection will satisfy anyone why the starry heavens present the appearance they do.

The most powerful telescopes shoot right through the stars in our cluster and bring into view thousands of other clusters scattered through space. The positions of more than three thousands of clusters hav been determined and the number of these islands and continents of stars is constantly being multiplied, as telescopic power is increased, until there seems to be no limit.

It is not to be expected that a full and complete treatis on the sidereal heavens can be given in an article of this kind. My object is to present to the mind, in the easiest way, a sufficient idea of our sidereal surroundings to show that the Mosaic account of creation was written in igrorance, and that the pretense that it was dictated by divine wisdom is the veriest sham.

Who can contemplate these myriads of shining orbs, these suns and systems, and believe that Moses knew anything about them?

Rev. Morris, the great harmonizer, says that all of these globes, some of them far transcending our sun in brightness, and millions of times larger, were made for man's "benefit and accommodation," and that "they were not created out of pre-existing matter, but were made out of nothing."

This is absurdity run mad. Bring forth all the Munchausenisms of the ages, and they are to be taken as rational statements when compared to this hotch-potch account of creation as written down in the book of Genesis.

What would be thought of a man's sanity who should build a temple costing ten millions of dollars for the accommodation of a colony of ants? And to say that infinit wisdom created millions of gorgeous sidereal temples for the purpose of lighting up this little ball of earth is a hundred times more absurd.

Think of God making such a globe as Lyra out of nothing in ten minutes without tools. For if he "created the heavens and the earth and all the hosts of them" in six days, he certainly could not hav spent more than ten minutes on such a globe as Lyra.

Say twice two are ten, three times six are forty; say what you will, I defy the ingenuity of man to invent anything more ridiculous. When Blair, Comstock, Wanamaker & Co. get the Bible introduced into the schools, they might as well banish the study of astronomy, for no one who believes the book of Genesis to be the word of God will ever credit the facts of astronomy. And when a knowledge of astronomy is obtained, good bye to old Moses.

No one who has learned the facts of astronomy will ever believe the book of Genesis to be inspired. The truth is, God inspired Moses to write no more than he knew, and he had no more knowledge of the earth and solar system, and the myriads of shining worlds scattered through space, than the times in which he lived afforded. If God knew about these clusters and islands of stars, he would hav spent his time to much better advantage in telling Moses about them than in playing bo-peep with him among the rocks.

To the intelligent mind the account of creation as given in Genesis furnishes the best clew to the ignorance of the times in which the writer lived that could be obtained. He probably heard the braying of an ass and thought it was the voice of God, and therefore concluded that he was inspired. It would seem from reading the book of Genesis that God kept talking about that which was of the least importance to man, and withheld the knowledge that would hav proved the most useful. It would hav taken him but a moment to tell us how something could be made out of nothing, and as he had a whole eternity at his disposal, and as he took time to tell us how sticks were turned into snakes, he must hav thought that information of the most importance to us.

The great harmonizer says: "The true character of the sun was learned by slow and laborious steps. The common theory was that the earth was the center of the universe, and that the sun and moon and stars revolved around it." But why should these steps hav been so slow and laborious? Did not God want us to know anything about the family of worlds to which we belong? If he did not, was it not a grievous sin against God to endeavor to find out about them? If he did want us to know, could he not hav left out the story about Samson and his foxes and given us just a few hints to put us on the right track? Did God think that a knowledge of the machinery of the solar system was of less importance to the human family than the Munchausenism of blowing down the walls of a city with ram's horns? It must hav tickled God to see the old Ptolemaics puzzling over their twenty-six solid transparent spheres one within another, revolving so as to carry the sun, moon, planets, and fixed stars along with them at different velocities.

Just imagin him sitting on his great white throne filling the immensity of space, and enjoying his quid of cavendish, with a broad grin and a knowing wink of his "all-seeing eye," looking down upon the poor noddies tugging at the complex problem of the solar system which they were unable to solve, and saying to himself: "Work away, you are on the wrong trail; these suns and systems which I hav created are full of puzzles, and it is just amusing to me to see you trying to make a globe like the sun revolve around a flat earth. Like monkeys you are trying to untangle a skein of yarn, but the more you monkey the more the tangle increases."

Now, if a knowledge of the solar system is wicked, how greatly are all Christians who teach it sinning against God! If right, why did God allow his children to remain in ignorance and doubt so many centuries, when a few hints in his book would hav removed all doubt and prevented much torture and persecution, and given his chosen people a grand start in scientific investigation? It certainly would hav taken no longer than it did to tell about a talking jackass.

"And God spake to Moses." It is a curious fact that God has always done the most of his talking to the most ignorant people. It is no wonder that God commanded such a bloodthirsty horde as the Jews were to wage wars of extermination, and "rip up" helpless mothers and butcher innocent children. And it is no wonder that he never gave them much useful information.

In the eastern world are true representativs of the ancient Jews whom God talked to, and they know just as much of the science of astronomy, or any other science, as the author of Genesis did, and no more. They know no more about the cause of an eclipse than savages who try to drive the bad spirit from the sun by rattling drums and uttering hideous yells.

They are no wiser to-day than they were a thousand years ago, and a more ignorant, repulsiv, degraded class of people are nowhere to be found. If Heston should go there, he could giv us a perfect picture of God in THE TRUTH SEEKER, for they were made in the image of God, and a true picture of one of these primitiv men with a hooked nose and sloping forehead, who traces his origin clear back to original dirt, would doubtless giv us the best idea of God that could be obtained, but it would be a little tough on a civilized God.

A short time ago I read a description of those ancient people by a traveler who had been among them long enough to learn their habits, customs, and peculiarities. That night I dreamed of being among toads and lizards and all manner of creeping reptils and monsters, some dead and in an advanced state of decomposition, and the scene was so horrible and the odor so offensiv that I jumped out of bed and the spell was broken. But the impression was so vivid that it tormented me all day.

It is no wonder that such a people should be under the direct influence of God. The wonder is that civilized people of the nineteenth century should be under the influence and control of such a people and such a God. It is bad enough to eat crow, but crow that stinks—well, my stomach fails—let us think of something that pertains to civilization.

And worse than all, the idea that such a God designed everything to take place just as it does, and that he designed it for the very best. The Christian sees design in every blade of grass, in every opening flower, in every animal, and throughout the universe. The great Herbert Morris says, "From the creation true philosophy as well as religion leads us up to a designing creator." Yes, a great planet like Jupiter, which he did not mention in his account of creation, leads up to a designing creator; but turning an old woman into salt, and covering a great country like Egypt with frogs and lice, and turning sticks into snakes, would lead us, philosophically, up, or down, to a great conjuror. Considered in that light, he is entitled to the belt, but as a great designer and world-maker he is a great fizzle.

I hav referred to the distance of the fixed stars. If the object in creating these stars was "to giv light upon the earth," what object could there hav been in creating millions of stars so far distant from us that their feeble light can never reach the earth? We can only know of their existence because we are obliged to infer that all space is not a blank beyond the reach of our vision. Besides, there are only comparativly few stars that are not telescopic stars. Were all of these stars created for one out of a million to peep at with their telescopes, and which man would never hav known anything about had it not been for the lucky invention of that instrument? Does this look like intelligent design?

There is another view to be taken in regard to the designs of this all-seeing God. What was the object in creating all the huge monsters that are known to hav existed long before man's advent upon the earth? It is evident that the author of Genesis knew nothing about these animals which had passed away thousands of years before the account of creation was written. Were these created for man? Could he hav "dominion over them?" Did old Adam name them? Did God "bring them before Adam to see what he would call them?"

The Christian puts on a holy scowl, and says, "You tempt God when you ask such questions." The truth is, you always tempt God when you corner a Christian.

The Christian will tell you that God never works without a purpose, and that his purposes all tend to the well-being and happiness of man. When you ask him what purpose God had in spending so much time and wasting so much raw material in creating the great animals which inhabited both land and water, thousands of years before God played the rib trick on old Adam, he looks at his rubber, and not knowing just how to squeeze it, exclaims, "Great is the mystery of godliness." This is called Christian philosophy.

The number of animals seen by the unaided eye is as nothing compared with the wonders revealed by the microscope. The sands of the sea will hardly compare with them in number. They are sometimes referred to as animalcules, infusoria, etc. But they are all animals, and I shall class them under the general head of insects, because the word is better understood.

Hundreds of miles of the ocean's bed, and in some places many feet deep, are covered with animals living and dead. This may seem like a marvelous statement, but some of them will reproduce of their kind 170,000 000,000,000 in four days, and of some kinds 500,000,000 may be contained in a single drop of water.

Oceans, lakes, streams, and pools are teeming with animals which we never should hav known anything about if the microscope had not been invented. Of all the world's population, first and last, not one out of every million has known anything about them. Will some Christian tell me where God's design was in creating them, if they were designed for man's benefit?

In order to understand the full force of the design argument it will be necessary to go back before "the beginning," before the creation of the earth, moon, sun, and stars, when God alone was.

There were neither angels, archangels, or devils—just nothing and God.

He had all knowledge, consequently he knew when and how everything would turn out down to the last tick of time's old clock. He had all power, consequently he had all power to prevent as well as create. He planned and foresaw the construction of the minutest insect as well as a world. From this standpoint it must appear that nothing could take place contrary to his design.

When he planted the tree of forbidden fruit in the garden he must hav known all the consequences that would follow, or he lacked knowledge. If he could not prevent the consequences which followed the eating of the forbidden fruit he lacked power. Assuming that he had almighty power and infinit knowledge, it must follow that he was well pleased with the whole transaction, and that it all turned out just as he designed. Adam, the first and most notorious sneak, whom God pronounced "very good," laid the blame upon his wife. Christians lay the blame on the devil, and then claim that he was a fallen angel. This seems to let God out. If there was an angel that would turn to a devil, God must hav known it, and had power to prevent it, so that his dealings with our first parents and the consequent fall of man must hav been a foregone conclusion from "the beginning."

Therefore sickness, disease, death, and all the dire calamities that human flesh is heir to, and hell for nine tenths of the human family, must hav been foreseen and indorsed before the earth was formed, when God alone was. If this statement is not correct, then the devil must hav thwarted a part of God's plans and had more power than he. God knew that Bennett would found THE TRUTH SEEKER, and had the power to prevent it, but did not do it, therefore it is reasonable to infer that he is pleased with that paper. If he is a sensible God I know he is.

Christian Progress.

Just now some Christians are endeavoring to find comfort in the fact that new churches are still being built, and that the numbers who attend them are said to be increasing rather than diminishing. They argue that because there are more places of worship than there were some years ago, Christianity is not, as we maintain it is, gradually but surely passing out of existence. They fail to see that every new religious body represents some former Christian dogma abandoned; that every preacher who attracts an increased congregation does so by the increased liberality of his views. They do not grasp the situation that the body which prolongs its existence by every day amputating some of its members must in time be left without any member to be amputated.

I once knew a dog that thought he was a bigger dog than he was. This dog became associated in my mind with Christianity. He imagined that he owned the street in which he happened to be. No other dog had any rights there. No other dog was justified in being a dog. If he presumed to be a dog he must fight for it. This dog differed from Christianity chiefly in one particular. He was generally victorious in his combats. But it always cost him something. One day he would lose an eye, the next a tooth, and so on. He would swagger and bully all the same, but there was less dog. It was evidently only a question of time until there would be no dog at all.

Now, Christianity is a very ugly old dog that wants to be the only one of his race. There are a good many other dogs that think they hav some rights here, too. Some are great, noble fellows, and others are mean little curs that do not amount to much anyway. But be they big or little, good or bad, Christianity wants to fight them. He has been fighting them for a good many centuries, but he is not nearly so dangerous as he used to be. He growls a good deal, but his teeth hav all been knocked out, and he cannot bite worth a cent.

The Christian dog used to be very proud of his tail. It was very long. It had a great many joints, and every joint was an article of faith. Look at the miserable little stump he tries to wag now. He used to glory in predestination and election, in original sin, in baptismal regeneration, in verbal inspiration, in a personal devil, in eternal hell fire and damnation. He has lost these in his many combats, and is yet unable to reckon one victory to his credit.

Some years ago Bishop Colenso disproved the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. The orthodox cried "heresy," but the authority of the Pentateuch was gone forever, and Colenso retained his bishoprick. Now McQueary denies the resurrection and virginal maternity. The Apostles' creed and all the other creeds declare both doctrins to be true, but an Episcopalian minister says they are false. And the next generation may not find them among the essentials of Christianity.

The churches now are places where people go to see Christianity dissected, to find some of its old teachings dropped and some human principle substituted. The greater the number of professing Christians, the less Christianity. But let us not conclude from this that if we sit still, Christianity will die of itself. It is becoming humanized, its preachers are teaching some natural truths for which in the days of its power it would hav burnt them alive, but that is because Liberals hav knocked some of the nonsense out of it by solid argument and wholesome ridicule, and the vacancy had to be filled with something better. Moral: Continue to knock, and knock hard.

The Sun and Moon Stood Still.

In a recent address, Sereno E. Todd, of Orange, N.J., said: "This representation concerning the sun and moon standing still is also one of the impressiv allegories of the Bible. It is an interesting story for children and feeble-minded adults who hav always employed a priest to think for them. But, let us consider the statements and examin them in a philosophic and scientific point of view, and we can not fail to perceive that all this is an allegory or fable. If we undertake to interpret the language literally and to understand it as significant of truth and fact, we cannot fail to see that the entire fabric is only a magnificent tissue of sacerdotal nonsense. We all know that the sun doesn't go around the world. The sun stands still. The earth goes around the sun, and the moon revolves around the earth. Now, the earth has two motions, one of which is, it rolls over and over as a ball does when it is thrown through the air; and the other is the motion of a pendulum or ball when swinging in an elliptical orbit. Now, think for a moment of the immense magnitude of our earth; contemplate the vast continents and immense oceans; picture in the mind a ball eight thousand miles in diameter and twenty-five thousand miles around, and going through space at the frightful velocity of sixty-eight thousand miles per hour (faster than a rifle-ball moves) and we will hav a correct idea of the motion of our earth. Now, then, in order to produce the phenomenon of the sun standing still, our earth must stop revolving from west to east, and the moon must stop in her course. What must they stop for? Well, God, the great creator of the sun, moon, and earth, happened to see a battle raging between two armies of fleas or grasshoppers. (The Bible represents men as grasshoppers in God's sight.) As the contest was so hot and the battle so desperate and the armies so equally matched, that night was likely to come on before either army had gained a victory, God employed his vast power to stop the moon in her course and to prevent the earth from revolving, in order to make a day twice as long as usual, so that these grasshoppers could hav daylight to fight by. God had power to create those two armies, and giv them power to hack each other to pieces; and he had power to make the earth and the moon and to send them whirling through space. But he couldn't annihilate one of those armies. He couldn't giv one side twice as much power as the other! He couldn't hav struck one side with blindness in an instant! He couldn't hav stopped the breath of one of those armies! Oh, no! But he could stop the earth revolving, and compel the moon to stand still. Then, after the battle was fought and victory was won he could set old earth and the moon to whirling again. It must be that God had never seen a battle before, and he was interested to see how the contest would terminate. Ask any good astronomer or philosopher if he ever supposed for a moment that any such phenomenon ever occurred, in truth or in fact? He will tell you emphatically, no."

A Splendid Specimen of Theological Reasoning.

Joseph Symes in the Melbourne Liberator.

Mr. Gladstone is writing some most egregious nonsense, in Good Words, about Genesis. But he does not know what to make of it. We are glad to find him helping to destroy the credit of the old book, as every critic must do who sets about its defense. Mr. Gladstone would employ his time quite as usefully and quite as successfully if he undertook the defense of that other nursery tale,

> Heigh diddle, diddle!
> The cat with the fiddle;
> The cow jumped over the moon!
> The little dog laughed to see such sport;
> And the dish ran away with the spoon!

Now Infidels may laugh, as that profane dog did; but can anyone in his senses deny that there is a moon? that there is a cow? that there is a dog? that there is a cat? that there is a fiddle? that there is a dish? that there is a spoon? Let the skeptic say! Let him deny it if he dare! And if all this is admitted, who shall say that the cow did not jump over the moon? It is true, we cannot say which cow; divine wisdom hath not revealed that; but we are told the cow—mark, the article is the definit article; and that shows that the cow was a well-known one. The writer who witnessed the miracle knew the cow; and so did his first readers. He says the cow. And note too, he speaks in the same definit manner about the dog, the cat, the dish, the fiddle, the spoon. This, my deloved brethren, shows that the animals and the articles were well known. So the writer could not be in doubt as to what he wrote.

And now note the statements, the assertions, of this divine revelation! That a cat may be with a fiddle is certainly not improbable. That a dog should laugh is quite likely, for did not Balaam's donkey converse with his master? and did not the serpent converse with Eve? And who can be so unreasonable as to doubt if a dish could run away with or without the spoon? Let anyone try it on a table canted beyond the angle of stability, and he will soon find a dish may run away with a good number of spoons, and prove him to be a spoon who tries the experiment. This being granted, we hav now to prove that the cow jumped over the moon. And, by God's assistance, it shall be demonstrated. 1 No one can prove that the cow did not jump over the moon; for (1) you know not what a cow may do. Because you did not see this miracle, that can be no objection to it. You hav never seen your own midriff or your own brain. How dare you then deny this miracle because you forsooth! did not witness it! Who ever said you did? (2) You do not, cannot know, where the moon was when the cow jumped over it, nor yet where the cow was. The cow may hav been in heaven and the moon below her. Indeed, a score of situations may be thought of in which the cow could perform the miracle. 2. When we find a whale swallowing Jonah, how can we doubt the jumping of the cow over the moon? 3. How can we doubt it in face of the fact that a woman was once seen with the moon under her feet (Rev. xii, 1)? Thus do we prove the blessed truth, the comforting and edifying revelation, respecting the jumping cow, the fiddling cat, the laughing dog, and the kleptomaniac dish that went off with the spoon!

There, reader, you hav something quite as solid as Mr. Gladstone's defense of Genesis, and qually as good as any argument ever advanced in favor of the Bible as a divine revelation.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

A new Freethought society has seen the light of day in Hildesheim. Dr. Voelkel, of Magdeburg, gave the first public lecture August 24th.

The court of Mannheim, Baden, has sentenced Daniel Keller to two months' imprisonment for blasphemy uttered in a restaurant. Mr. Keller denied the existence of God and a future life, and stated that Christ was a Socialist.—Freiheit.

On August 3d the Freethought societies of Seine-et-Oise held a public demonstration in honor of Etienne Dolet, a writer and printer burnt for heresy Aug. 3, 1583, on Moubert place. Members of the Paris municipality and of the chamber of deputies participated.—La Vérite.

In Cöln the police authorities are after the Spiritualists. A medium has been found guilty of "obtaining money on false pretenses." "In the nineteenth century we hav neither miracles nor revelations, and if such are insisted upon, the appearance of them must be demonstrated," said the court. And yet Freethinkers are persecuted for blasphemy if they speak or write against miracles, comments Das Menschenthum.

A serious calamity is about to befall us Freethinkers, says Das Menschenthum. The pope is busy preparing an encyclical in which he will giv the faithful some infallible medicin wherewith to exterminate Freethought. It consists in studying the Bible. If we remember right, another infallible pope once prohibited the reading of said volume of antiquated lore, inasmuch as it would "confound" the reader's faith.

A Protestant edition of the Holy Inquisition has apparently been organized in Prussia. The police searched the houses of several members belonging to the executiv committee of the Free Religious Society to find the stenographic report of a lecture delivered the 29th of June this year. They succeeded at last; but not satisfied therewith they began breaking the furniture in the society's library-room. Nothing like a union of church and state.—Freireligiöses-Sonntags-Blatt.

The priests in France are generally a very submissiv lot, that make themselvs as invisible as possible, but once in a great while some one will imagin that he livs in the sixteenth century. This was evidently the case with a "father" in the city of Moulins, who created quite a sensation at the funeral of a French Freethinker, Andre Driffort, by resisting the entrance of the funeral procession to the cemetery and at the same time uttering some "Christian" words about hell, etc. The priest was arrested.

On August 17th the Stockholm Freethought Society made an excursion to the city of Westeras, the residence of Bishop Billings. The Westeras Freethinkers and nearly a thousand citizens received the excursionists and escorted them to an open place outside the city, where Mr. Lennstrand gave to an audience of over three thousand one of his best lectures, "What is Preached in the Christian Churches?" The city papers, of course, were shocked over the insult offered to the good name of the orthodox city.

The Congress of Swedish Freethinkers was held on August 9th and 10th. After the business part of the meeting was over, several topics were taken up for discussion, among which we must mention, "Is there a Necessity for an Antichristian Movement?" and 'Ought a Freethinker under all Circumstances to Acknowledge His Belief?" Both questions were answered in the affirmativ. Sunday evening was given over to pleasure. Mr. Lennstrand gave some very edifying extracts from the "Gospel of Infancy." Poems were recited, speeches were made, and it was resolved to send a resolution of thanks to Mr. J. M. Wheeler, of the London Freethinker, for the great services he had rendered the young society.

As our readers are aware, Viktor E. Lennstrand was to deliver his first lecture since his imprisonment on August 31; but the ingenious authorities found that such use of the right of free speech was contrary to a certain law paragraph, which no one ever before thought could be applied to prohibit two lectures which Swedish juries had found all right, and which had been delivered before by some one else. On the motion of Mr. Lennstrand there was held a public discussion of this the latest "fad" of Swedish justice, and several hundred citizens gave their assent to hav their names affixed to a remonstrance against this breach of a citizen's rights. And that the minister of justice should not think it was without his jurisdiction, a copy of said resolution was sent to him, together with an open letter from Messrs. Berghell and Hellborg, who likewise were forbidden to deliver the lectures.

Fourteenth Annual Congress.

The Fourteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union has been appointed by the board of directors to meet at Portsmouth, O., on Friday evening, October 31 1890, and to continue its sessions on the Saturday and Sunday following.

The meetings will be held in the Grand Opera House, corner of Sixth and Court streets, and the orchestra of the establishment has been engaged for the occasion. Due notice will be given of the proposed reduction in railroad, steamboat, and hotel fares.

Portsmouth is situated on the Ohio river, one hundred miles east of Cincinnati, and one hundred miles south of Columbus, and has extensiv and convenient railway connections with the whole country. It is a port of foreign entry, and is distinguished for its numerous and magnificent manufactories. It has a population exceeding fifteen thousand, has twenty churches, the Ohio Military Academy, and a splendid system of graded schools. The Ohio valley fair is held there annually; and several English and German papers, daily and weekly, are published in the city.

The members and friends of the American Secular Union are sure of a hearty welcome, not only from our enterprising local auxiliary, but also from the citizens at large.

The object of the American Secular Union, as is well known, is to secure the total separation of church and state in fact and in form, to the end that equal rights in religion, genuin morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood be established, protected, and perpetuated. While we unite on what is commonly known as the Nine Demands of Secularism, we propose to emphasize the following at the coming Congress:

1. The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.

2. The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.

3. The repeal and prevention of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons.

4. The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character.

The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both religion and politics, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but heartily welcomes all persons, of whatever faith, to its membership, on the basis of "no union of church and state." The word "secular" is here used in the broadest sense, as applied to the state, and not to any system of religion or philosophy.

To discuss these questions in an orderly and friendly manner, and to devise ways and means to promote these objects, let us come together at this Congress as Freethinkers, Spiritualists, Unitarians, Universalists, Free Religionists, Quakers, progressiv Jews, and liberal Christians, and, laying aside our peculiar views on religious questions, unite as American citizens on the one broad platform of no union of church and state, and the complete administration of our secular government on purely secular principles.

The National Reform Association, having for its object the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the state by constitutional enactment; the American Sabbath Union, working for the enforcement, by legislation, of the Jewish and puritanic Sabbath on our free citizens; the Women's Christian Temperance Union, indorsing the platform and policy of both these organizations; the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, insisting through their ecclesiastical bodies upon the complete exemption of church property from just taxation, as well as the appropriation of public money for religious schools and other sectarian institutions; all these, and many others which might be mentioned, are imperiling our constitutional liberties. Every true Liberal and patriot, whether man or woman, should feel called upon to aid in organizing an effectiv opposition to these nefarious schemes.

Due notice will be given of the selection of eminent speakers from all portions of the United States and Canada, and a free platform will be given to all persons who may hav a word to say for pure state secularization. All, without exception, are welcome to this Congress in the wide-awake little city in the valley of the beautiful Ohio.

What is Faith?

In a recent issue of the Sunday Sun appeared an article from the pen of the Rev. A. Young, of the Paulist Fathers, entitled "Faith or Reason," in which he defines faith as "a belief in an act of the intellect assenting to divine truth by command of the will moved by the grace of God." This definition will doubtless do very well for those who are content to accept the dogmatic authority of St. Thomas Aquinas, from whom the definition is taken. But it will not satisfy the honest doubter and fearless investigator, and therefore they still require an answer to the question, "What is faith?" an answer which shall possess the qualification of being somewhat easier to be understood, and having also the merit of being a little more in accordance with common sense.

I doubt very much if the Rev. Mr. Young himself knew the meaning of that which he wrote, for when we find a man calling faith "a belief in an act of the intellect," etc., we may fairly assume that either his pen or his mind has been wandering. Now, to believe a thing we must hav positiv knowledge of it, and just in proportion as faith is based upon positiv knowledge it ceases to be faith and becomes, instead, an intellectual conviction. What then is faith? Is it an intellectual conviction? Is it to believe that which is evident? No. It is perfectly evident that two and two do not make any more than four, also that each of the three sides of an equilateral triangle are equal to each other. These are facts which rest on positiv knowledge, and knowledge transcends faith. Faith in the theological sense is the believing not of that which seems true, but that which seems false to the understanding. Faith is the result produced by the protraction of man's intellect upon the threshold of the unknown; daring not to cross into the mysterious regions beyond, he says, "I believe." It is easier to speak these two words than to struggle on in doubt, searching for the truth. Faith is not the result of free inquiry, or the outcome of knowledge. It is not, like astronomy, or geology, a subject which can be rendered evident to the senses. Faith, however, has existed in all ages. The poor Hindoo had faith in the miraculous waters of the Ganges; the Roman Catholic, in the abstinence from meat on Fridays; the Jew, in the coming of messiah. All these and many other fallacies under the guise of religion hav their votaries, their faithful.

It is not possible for us to hav two mental masters. Reason and faith cannot each reign in one sphere. Therefore the Secularist teaches that religious faith throughout is mischievous and unreasonable. It is unreasonable, because a man's religious faith is mainly the result of his rearing; it is mischievous, because he who uses faith in matters religious will be inclined to use it in matters political, thereby opposing man to man, checking human progress, and marring human happiness. Divine faith, about which so much has been said, is nothing more than mere credulity brought under subjection. Men are told by their mental masters to believe, therefore they submit their understanding, they tremble to examin, they try to avoid doubt, they shun investigation, and cry out with painful repetition, "I believe, I believe."

What is faith? In theological parlance it is the annihilation of reason and the prostration of the intellect. No man can believe that a virgin bore a child and still retained her virginity. No man can believe that men dead for ages came to life. He who says, "I do believe these things," will see beyond the possibility of a doubt, if he only reflects for a moment on what is passing in his mind, that he cannot and does not believe them. And then it is truly amusing to notice how this divine faith vanishes into nothingness before scientific research—before ascertained and demonstrable facts.

What faith said was true yesterday, is by its preachers taught as an error to-day. In the ages gone by faith occupied a castle built out of the bricks of ignorance and superstition, but now the day of man's reason is dawning. It is now rising over the hills of progress, and the apostle of faith must take rank with his brethren of every age and clime.

As man progressed from his savage state, he mixed with his prayers the traditions of his ancestors, which ultimately became creeds sanctified with age. These creeds hav been taught by father to son, repeated by rote without thought or inquiry, and if one were bold enough to think and to speak his thoughts he was crushed, and thus faith has ever been like a millstone round the neck of thought, dragging it down and destroying man's noblest aspirations. The "I believe" prevents the "I think."

Faith smothers a thousand thoughts at their birth, for when any fact is brought before the worshiper which seems to be contrary to his faith, he prostrates his intellect before it, further progress with him becomes impossible, he is halted in his onward course because a creed lies in his path—a creed meaningless in itself, but one which he repeats thoughtlessly until it becomes a part of himself. The motto to the "Oracle of Reason" was in these words: "Faith's empire is the world; its monarch, God; its ministers, the priests; and its slaves, the people." This empire has lasted long enough, a change of administration is necessary, for in this age there should be no slaves. However, the people's minds are growing stronger. Science is taking the place of faith. Science tells us what we are, and how we liv, while faith only lets us guess vaguely at that which may never be. And now the passionless labor of science is slowly but surely doing its work—it is undermining the power of faith. Here a hoary fallacy has been laid prostrate, there a quagmire has been filled up by the sunken forms of a hundred intolerances. Thus the road which before quaked at the footsteps of a child has been made to tremble not at the tread of a giant. Monstrous superstitions hav been shivered at the roots, and the sun, toward which, as the emblem of perfection, we are all hastening, now shines upon and gladdens our way.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

Our London Letter.

The "clergy of all denominations" who accepted the invitation given them to witness the play of "Judah" at the Shaftesbury theater last month made a large and appreciativ audience, and showed that they are by no means averse to dramatic entertainments, provided there is nothing to pay, though perhaps the evening would hav been considered nearer perfection if there had been a tea-meeting to commence the proceedings. The manager of the theater mentioned in a speech to the audience that only eight out of twelve hundred clergymen with whom he had communicated on the subject had condemned theatricals.

Mr. Spurgeon recently delivered himself of the opinion that this was the day of thinking, but that ten bushels of much of the thinking done was not worth half a farthing for a man who wanted spiritual food. I do not quite gather what is his definition of thinking, something substantial no doubt, as it can be measured by the bushel, but he got pretty near hitting the mark, as it is certain the individual who requires what is generally understood as spiritual food does not want anything connected with brains, unless cooked and served in a dish. The great man stated that "Jesus Christ himself was not an original thinker," and I believe something to this effect has been said by sundry unbelievers, who hav been well abused for such a suggestion, but when the blasphemous utterance of an Atheist is reproduced by a "man of God," then it becomes a profound thought and worthy of consideration. Mr. Spurgeon also said that people can never be saved by revivals, by excitement, and spasms, which is quite the reverse to what he professed to believe when he first started in the soul-saving business, but now his position is assured, and he waxes old and lazy, he doesn't set much store by his old methods, and objects to anyone else taking them up to his detriment—rather a dog-in-the-manger sort of feeling on his part.

The one and only Booth has been making some rather sensible suggestions about the marriage question in connection with his Army, and which might be followed with advantage by others. He does not go in for the scriptural injunction to increase and multiply recklessly; it is not surprising that he requires all members to marry other Salvationists, so that he can guarantee a pure breed of believers. It seems rather late in the day for him to take up the subject of sexuality, and it would appear that he now disapproves of the promiscuous intercourse for which his Army had credit during the early days of their career.

Lord Salisbury is possessed of no small amount of gratitude, for although the papal rescript sent to Ireland did not hav the desired effect, he considered some return ought to be made to the pope for his good intentions, so he kindly accredited an embassador extraordinary to the Vatican, and gave the pope the right to superintend marriages in the island of Malta, those not celebrated by the Romish church not now being legal. This is rather rough on the Protestant party there, and it is curious that a man posing as a stanch Church of England man should hav done this, while Mr. Gladstone, who has been frequently accused of leaning toward Rome, should so strongly oppose the measure.

The iniquitous law disallowing bequests for Freethought purposes hinders the propaganda very considerably, and I hear that a committee is to be formed to work strenuously for its repeal. Of course there will be no end of opposition, and it will need some stiff work and probably take a considerable time before justice is obtained. If the Christian religion had not been so supported by such enactments from the time of Constantine to the present day, it would hav had a comparativly short life, which would hav been so much better for the world. J. D.

Robert Burns was a Freethinker.

Robert A. Riddell in the Agnostic Journal.

I recently purchased your [W. Stewart Ross's] book entitled, "Why I am an Agnostic," and, looking over the advertisments at the end, I saw that one of your miscellaneous pamphlets had for its title, "Robert Burns: Was he a Christian?" As I believe I am the only man now living who can answer that question, I write to tell you that he was a Freethinker, and I do so on the authority of my father, who for some years was the intimate friend and companion of Burns, and who often used to talk to me about him. My father was the youngest son of Captain Robert Riddell, of Carzield, Dumfries-shire, and of Castle Gardens in the town of Dumfries. He also had the large house near the churchyard, where he used to reside in the winter months. When Burns had been appointed exciseman of the Dumfries district, my grandfather invited him to his house, and became to him what Mæcenas was to Horace—his patron and protector. At that time my father was about fourteen years of age, and, although he had never been taught to draw or engrave, had astonished all who knew him by his wonderful and artistic sketches from nature, and the engravings he had made from his drawings of Caerlaverock Castle, New Abbey, and other picturesque objects in that part of the country. Burns was charmed with these products of my father's genius, and at once became his warmest friend; and that friendship was reciprocated by the youthful artist, who, on his part, was flattered at the praise bestowed on him by the poet. In short, they were always together when circumstances would allow. On many occasions my father used to accompany him when his duties called him away from Dumfries into the country, and, as both went on foot, they were sometimes compelled to sit down for a while to rest themselvs, and perhaps take a slight refreshment. Burns usually carried a small book in his coat pocket, and would take it out and read while he rested; and, of course, when my father was with him, he read aloud. In my father's opinion—and he was no bad judge—Burns was the finest and most impassioned reader of his time. In modulation and true expression of feeling he could not be surpassed; and he knew how to carry his hearers with him. The conversations he had with my father were mostly on the literature and the writers of that period; but sometimes he would giv his opinions on religion, and they were unquestionably those of a very decided Freethinker. What is more, he had written a satirical ballad on the (fabulous) incidents of the Christian creed, and would sometimes sing it to my father, who, when he told me about it, had unfortunately forgotten the words of that composition. All he could recollect of it was—

Little Jeezy, little Jeezy, they hung him on a pin.

I will only add that my father died in 1860, and that I hav now reached the age of eighty-six.

Sectarian Amenities.

From the Catholic Union and Times.

Chautauqua, the premier scholastic humbug of the continent, has just closed one of its windy annual sessions, and the universe is again permitted to do business at the old stand. During the recent lectures, the solar system, of course, held its breath to hear what the "great obscure" had to say about subjects of which they were entertainingly ignorant.

To contemplate the little great men of Chautauqua instructing the great little men of the same place in the marvelous achievements of that overgrown camp-meeting, one would imagin that all the worthies of antiquity remote and near lived too soon and missed the mightiest marvel of recorded time. In fact, how the world came to be created before the C. L. S. C. (Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle) is a question that lays Darwin's monkey hopelessly in the shade.

What has this "great university" done, one may ask, to justify all the ungrammatical eulogiums which are yearly showered upon its devoted head? Has it preached progress, learning, tolerance? Has it been really useful, over and above its very salient demerits? Let us see!

In religion it has calmly adopted the following platform framed by a Western joker:

(1). The earth belongs to the saints.

(2). We are the saints.

In pursuance of this noble and tolerant pronunciamento, the eloquent speakers employed their double back-action, patent reversible jaws in proving that the Catholic church and all professing that faith were enemies of humanity and conspirators against morality and religion. This, as one correspondent elegantly put it, was the Chautauqua process of "roasting Catholicism." Chautauqua's "roasting" will doubtless come later.

The tendency of this age is fair play. Persecution, vilification, bigotry, and intolerance belong to a time happily long past, whose horrors and injustice can never again impel rational beings to fly at each other's throats because of different creeds. The reign of religious amity has been ushered in, and not even the discordant stridulations of Chautauqua can mar, for any appreciable length of time, the "peace on earth" which is the glory of this Christian century.

As Chautauqua has belied its professions of progressiv thought, by inculcating creed proscription and religious bigotry, so in the realm of letters it is likewise "sounding brass and tinkling cymbal." In less biblical language, it is a scholastic fraud! It professes to giv by a few tracts and by a course of home reading all the advantages of college or university life. Nay, it will giv more, for "it is the greatest university in the world," and hence possesses advantages possessed by no other institution. It confers also diplomas and grants degrees.

The utter hollowness of its pretensions are, of course, patent to all but its enthusiasts and dupes; for the chief benefit of a university course is not "book learning," but college associations. Where are Chautauqua's associations except a three weeks' annual diet of windy bigotry? In this age when even the highest degrees of the oldest universities exact a smile of ridicule, how uproariously absurd appear the printed hallucinations of the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle. Verily, in the words of the estimable P. T. Barnum, "humbug takes." As a holy show Chautauqua is a success; but regarding its righteousness we hav our own private opinions.

The truth is, the place is a money-making concern. Sensationalism is its stock in trade, narrow-mindedness the breath of its nostrils. Its platform is the stamping ground of Rev. Waybacks from Nowhere, and its visitors are either critics or "jays." Long-haired men and short-haired women are among its frequent phenomena, and between "slugging the pope" and "advising the creator," the managers find time to show that the Revolutionary fathers were "dead wrong" in not consulting Dr. Vincent as to the best methods of running the government. When a dispassionate and philosophic observer views the Chautauquans, he is apt to reflect on that expressiv couplet:

To wonder now at Balaam's ass were weak;
Is there a day that asses do not speak?

Punishing Sabbath Breakers.

John Cowen in Auberon Herbert's Free Life (London).

Every Monday morning in the town of Hull the solicitors turn up half an hour later than usual at the borough police court; the representativs of the press giv themselvs half an hour's grace in addition to their customary unpunctuality; and the witnesses spend half an hour longer than usual over their pint-pots round the corner. You see it would be such utter waste of time to sit in court sucking one's thumbs while the "Lord's day cases" are taken. Nobody cares about them.

Nobody. Not even the victims. Even the "drunk and disorderly"—that oft-repeated customer—occasionally affords something that is interesting, or something that is ludicrous; but the Lord's day case, never. Everything is cut and dried; the same old process Monday after Monday. The stipendiary takes his seat, the chief constable makes his bow—if even he is there so early—the court is silenced, and P. C. Smith, C 21, steps in the box and takes the oath.

"Are you sworn, constable?"

"Yes, your w'ship."

"What is it?"

"Wm. Cavendish, tobacco on the 5th."

"Five shillings; stand down."

Then P. C. Jones: "John Grub, sweets on the 12th, your w'ship."

"Five shillings."

P. C. Brown: "Charles Tandstickor, matches on the 12 h."

"Five shillings."

Forty times repeated. The same old names, same old sins, same old smiles of recognition, and same old echo of "Five shillings" from the same old dispenser of summary jurisdiction.

Forty respectable-looking tradesmen who hav hitherto lived in peace and quietness, and in harmony with the world in general, hav broken that celebrated law of his late majesty Charles II., of pious memory, known as the Lord's Day Act. They are summoned, fined, and go back and keep open next Sunday as before. They find they can make it pay to keep their shops open on a Sunday and pay the fine. It amounts to a regular license, payable weekly. The learned stipendiary, than whom no man is more respected in his own sphere, and no man more admired for clearness of judgment, probably has his opinions, but he is there to administer, not to criticise the law, and Charles II. remains triumphant still.

Mr. Pentecost Agrees With Mr. Tolstoi.

From the Twentieth Century.

In referring to my "Demands" one of the editorial writers of the Individualist says:

We would like to ask whether Mr. Pentecost sanctions the existing marriage laws? His failure to demand free love is what Helen Gardener would call "paying the tribute of a thoughtless yes" to existing sex slavery.

I believe in no statute laws whatever. I do not believe there is any large person in the universe, commonly called God, who has relations to men and women. I believe the church and the state, as organized, authoritativ institutions, are only and always detrimental to the happiness, the welfare, of the human race. Since marriage, as a religious or civil institution, is based on the recognition of the existence of a God or the authority of church or state, it inevitably follows that I do not "sanction the existence of marriage laws." I believe that marriage laws result in more misery and lewdness than would obtain without them. But I do not believe in "free love" as that phrase is commonly understood. Men and women should certainly be free to arrange their relationships to suit themselvs. If they were thus free I think they would arrange those relationships better than they are at present managed by the politicians and clergymen. I think they would eventually learn the wisdom of establishing them on some other basis than that of sex. As the brain increases the sex nature decreases. As the "union of beings" grows, sexual love dies. The more we are men and women the less we are animals. Why advocate conduct of which all but beasts are ashamed? I commend to the editors of the Individualist and others these words from the "Kreutzer Sonata:"

"But," said I, with astonishment, "how would the human race continue?"

"But what is the use of its continuing?" he rejoined, vehemently.

"What! What is the use? But then we should not exist."

"And why is it necessary that we should exist?"

"Why, to liv, to be sure?"

"And why liv? . . . The object of man, as of humanity, is happiness, and, to attain it, humanity has a law which it must carry out. This law consists in the union of beings. This union is thwarted by the passions. And that is why, if the passions disappear, the union will be accomplished. Humanity then will hav carried out the law, and will hav no further reason to exist."

The reviewers do not understand the "Kreutzer Sonata." They call Posdnicheff a lunatic; but he is the only person who has ever spoken wisely and lucidly on the sex question. Clergymen, editors, and many "free lovers" alike reject his message. Is it because it is a call to personal purity? Take one other quotation from the same wonderful pages:

The old foundation [legal marriage] is shattered; we must build a new one, but we must not preach debauchery.

Men and women should be free to regulate their conduct toward each other to suit themselvs. The sooner they are thus free the sooner will they learn that they will be less miserable in the exact ratio in which they eliminate sexual passion from the "union of beings."

The Metropolitan Museum Trustee.

(With Life's Apologies to Tom Moore.)

One day outside the heavenly gate
A trustee stood disconsolate.
And looking in he saw a place
Adorned with beauty and with grace.
A field where wondrous flowers grew,
Through which the birds of Eden flew,
Where, by sweet brooklets in the shade,
The souls of whilom mortals played.

Then questioned he: "What place is this?"
The answer came; "The realms of bliss
That man calls heaven and seeks to win."
The trustee asked: "Can I come in?".
And then the guardian of the gate
Replied, "Not now—you'll hav to wait.
To-day is Sunday, and, you know,
The gates are shut that day below."

"How long will Sunday last?" asked he.
The saint replied, "Eternally."

"The Bible is wholly of human origin, and abounds in contradictory, immoral, absurd, and inconsistent teachings," is what W. F. Jamieson will affirm for six nights in Kasson, Minn., commencing September 25th. "The teachings of the New Testament are all moral and elevating," Elder Nichols will affirm two nights. The elder says he is anxious to debate these questions. Jamieson says, "Barkis is willin'."

The American Library Association which met at the Fabyan House, White Mountains, last week heard reports on the experiment of the year—Sunday opening. They showed uniform success. The number of libraries opened on all holidays is constantly increasing. It was decided to make an association library exhibit at the Chicago World's Fair, and a committee was appointed to that end.

Communications.

The Beauty of Consistency.

Messrs. Micky Corrigan, T. D-Witt Talmage, Sam Jones, Howard Crosby, Rabbi Gottheil, Bishop Newman, and other well-known gentlemen, all diligently engaged in teaching what they do not know, assisted by a host of lesser lights, who follow along at various distances behind, are strenuously upholding a system of theology which depends entirely upon the theory of a future life. However the gentlemen named, and their respectiv followers, may differ among themselvs as to details, they are solidly united and in thorough accord and harmony in maintaining the notion of continued existence of the soul after death. Without that they could not even keep up the shadow of a pretense upon which to entice disciples and scoop in dollars. Their teachings upon that subject are so positiv that they profess, with great assurance, to tell how the poor inhabitants of this world are divided off, after death, into various separate states, conditions, or territories of joy or pain, as the case may be, and just what kind of persons, now living, are going, after their deaths, to be parceled off into these various territories. They will even describe the appearance and general features of these different territories, and the occupation of the population of each. Some of these gentlemen can giv details of the personality of these localities, and the manners and fashions prevailing there, with as much accuracy as characterizes Mr. Jenkins's reports of social transactions at Newport or Saratoga. A future spiritual existence is the essence of all their teaching. The notion of a continued life of a soul after the dissolution of the body, which that soul is alleged to hav animated in life, is the basis of all their theology. Without the means of imposing this notion of a hereafter upon the credulity of the people, these gentlemen would be forced to put up their shutters and go out of business.

Now comes Mr. Robert G. Ingersoll, and his friends, who say to Messrs. Corrigan & Co.: "Yours is a very pretty theory, but we are not entirely prepared to believe it, because there does not seem to be any adequate proof that it is true. We hav no objection to it if it be true, but we want some proof of its truth, and, as you seem so positiv about it, it is only fair that you should take upon you the burden of proof, and convince us that there is such a thing as that you call soul or spirit, and that it does liv after the body dies, and that it does do these various things which you describe, in the places you hav described, just as you hav described them. We will joyously accept your theories if you will convince our reason that they are true, but in the absence of such conviction we must decline to agree with you."

The position of Messrs. Ingersoll & Co. would seem to be reasonable enough and fair enough, and one would think that Messrs. Corrigan & Co. would hasten to prove their theories and to remove all dissent and doubt. But nothing can be further from this expectation than the conduct of the theologians, who, instead of proving what they are so positiv about and establishing beyond the reach of contradiction the theory which they teach with such assumption of wisdom, berate Mr. Ingersoll and his friends for entertaining doubts, and call them very bad and dangerous men. Now, when we consider the eagerness with which Messrs. Corrigan & Co. reach out in all directions after proselytes, and endeavor by all sorts of persuasion and artifice, except proof, to bring all sorts of people to accept their views, it is very strange that they should make no rational effort to convince the reason of Mr. Ingersoll and his friends, and the attitude they maintain toward the Agnostics leads fairly enough to the suspicion that they cannot furnish the proofs which the Agnostics insist upon having. In their situation, one would naturally think that the theologians would rapturously welcome anyone who could convince the Agnostics and silence their doubting questions with convincing proofs of the future life which is so important to the integrity of the theological position.

What, then, is the disappointment of the disinterested spectator, who cares for nothing but fair play, when he sees the theologians refuse a proffer of the very aid of which they seem to be sadly in need, for, at this juncture, along comes Mr. Walter E. Reid, the Spiritualist, who says: "Why, my dear religious friends, I'm sorry for you! Can't you deal with Messrs. Ingersoll & Co.? I'll help you. All the Agnostics want is proof of a future life. They are quite reasonable in demanding that proof. Turn them over to me. I'll make good theologians out of them after all. I'll satisfy them. I'll demonstrate the continued existence of the soul after death. I'll establish what you want proven by such incontrovertible proofs that there can be no denying it. I'll bring you all into direct communication with the spirits of dead men and that must be the end of all Mr. Ingersoll's denials." But the theologians get more angry with Mr. Reid than they did with Mr. Ingersoll, and they cry hurriedly: "Go away; go away, quick, Mr. Reid! Indeed we don't want any such fellows as you! You'll ruin our business! Don't you know that the fundamentals of religion must rest in belief, in faith, in gullibility, and not in demonstration? Don't you know that credulity is the starting-point of all religions, and that if you are going to make a religion succeed you must repudiate all such tomfoolery as demonstration?"

So they complained of Mr. Reid, and prosecuted him for fraud in a funny kind of court in Michigan, just to get him out of the way, so that his pernicious effrontery would not offend religious people, and he was convicted because he was "too fresh." He ought to hav known that the religious people to whom he so generously offered his aid did not want him nor his help. If he had more thoughtfully considered the evidences of their sincerity, he would never hav offered to help them, but he was too confiding, so he was convicted.

The conviction of Mr. Reid, if it proves anything, proves too much. For if Mr. Reid is a fraud, what shall be said of the court and what shall be said of Messrs. Corrigan & Co.?

The court would take no testimony not primarily qualified by an oath. By which oath the witness invokes the supervision of a spirit and makes a kind of bargain with the spirit whereby if the witness tells the truth nothing especial is to come of it in this real or pretended future life, but if the witness tells a falsehood, the spirit is free, under the terms of the bargain, to inflict in the hereafter the most dire and terrible penalties upon the witness's soul, and to punish that soul with even greater brutality than judges of mundane courts show in punishing their victims. While this kind of one-sided bargain did not excite in the judge of this court any suspicion of fraud, a mere desultory correspondence between one of Mr. Reid's clients and some spirit, wherein no bargain at all is developed, is grossly shocking to his curiously adjusted sensibilities, and he breaks forth into the denunciation, "It is prima facie evidence of fraud and requires no proof!" in a way that reminds us of another trial where the high priest said, "What further need hav we of witnesses?" (Matt. xxvi, 65). The judge manifested Ingersollian incredulity when he said, "The court is no place for exhibitions of the tricks of mountebanks and jugglers, whose tricks he [the judge] would not believe if sworn to on a pile of Bibles." Yet he goes on administering oaths as if an oath were something else than a mountebank trick. If swearing to a statement on a single Bible makes that statement credible, why will not an increase in the number of Bibles strengthen the credibility of the statement? The judge's dictum shakes the foundation of all judicial procedure, for with all his superstition he seems not to believe in the efficacy of the magic power of the oath to make true that which without the oath would be false. There is certainly something wrong about the court. I hope it is not fraud. It is certainly open to serious question whether the court has not exceeded its functions in assuming to decide that one class of dealers in futures is all right and another rival class all wrong, for this is really what the Reid case amounts to. If courts are to open up a new line of business and undertake the protection of fools from those who prey upon their gullibility, where will it all end? Must Messrs. Corrigan & Co. go to jail, too?

Messrs. Corrigan & Co. get thousands of dollars for every one dollar that Mr. Reid gets. Both get their dollars by trading on the same theory of a future life. The only difference between them seems to be that Mr. Reid's business is small in comparison to that of Corrigan & Co. Mr. Corrigan's associates get large salaries from their constituencies for telling about the communion of saints, the resurrection of the body, the life everlasting, and all that sort of thing. Can these theologians afford to hav their whole business swept away at one fell blow by a judicial decision that these cherished notions are in themselvs fraudulent? If Mr. Reid is a fraud, are they not all frauds, and the greater frauds in proportion as their business is more extensiv and more profitable than Mr. Reid's? Let us dismiss Messrs. Corrigan & Co., and end these remarks, with an appropriate quotation from Max Nordau:

> Those old women who get the hard-earned money away from servant-girls, under the pretense of giving them a love-philter to win back the hearts of their inconstant sweethearts, are arrested and fined by the authorities, but at the same time those men are paid fine salaries and upheld by the authorities, who obtain the money of the servant-girls by the no less false pretense of getting their deceased relatives out of the fires of purgatory, by some hocus-pocus arrangement.

Ecclesiastical vs. Civil Authority.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A second edition of the God-in-the-Constitution address is now ready, and at prices which will insure for it ready and rapid sale as soon as known. It can be had of the author, Concord, N. H., at prices named on title-page, wholesale or retail.

And I shall also be glad to hav you aid in the distribution, and will try to make the price to you so that it may at least be to you no disadvantage.

A very important and valuable addition to this second edition is made in a brief extract from one of the presidential messages of General Grant in relation to non-taxation of churches and other religious property, clinching hard my every argument.

By giving this insertion you will greatly aid one of our most important causes, and much oblige, my dear sir, Yours respectfully,

PARKER PILLSBURY.

Eminent Women.

SOPHIA HUGO.

One of the greatest men the world has produced was Victor Hugo. Another mother-made man. He owed his life to his mother, not only through a natural birthright, but through the maternal love that saved that life again and again during a sickly, puny babyhood.

When born he was "more dead than alive." He remained so sickly that for fifteen months after his birth "his shoulders seemed incapable of supporting the weight of his head." But his mother gave him the best of care, and succeeded in bringing him into a robust and vigorous state of health.

A few years ago I was at the Eden Musee, in New York, and one of the most striking figures there was that representing Victor Hugo. A large, strong man, with a noble head, bent over some writing, sat at a table, looking the picture of physical, moral, and intellectual strength and manliness. The loving mother-care thus preserved to the race a genius than whom none greater has trod the earth.

At one time Widow Hugo lived in a large house in the most deserted quarter of Paris. This house was shut in by a spacious garden. Victor in some of his reminiscences says: "Here in the time of the first empire, grew up three brothers. Together in their work and their play, rough-hewing their lives, regardless of destiny, they passed their time as children of the spring, mindful only of their books, of the trees and of the clouds, listening to the tumultuous chorus of the birds, but watched over incessantly by one sweet and loving smile—blessings on thee, O my mother!"

Sophia was a noble woman, gentle, kind, well-informed, systematic, and vigilant.

She reared her children to be moral, virtuous, and honest. Only a light trellis-work separated her garden from that of a neighbor. This man proposed putting up a more substantial barrier vs. the expected depredations of the boys.

"You need not be afraid," said Sophia, "my boys will not trespass upon your property. I hav forbidden them," and they never did. This one incident shows how well trained the children were, and how implicitly she trusted them, and how well she relied on her own teachings.

At one time they were called to go to Spain, and in six weeks she had them able to talk Spanish.

Sophia was an admirer of Voltaire, and to this Victor owes his broad-minded, Liberal sentiments on religion.

She was also a cousin of Volney, and therefore we could not expect her son to be pious in belief, though he was a Deist and not an Atheist.

But probably he outgrew all belief in all anthropomorphic gods, ere he died.

Nearly all who were Deists fifty years ago would naturally be Atheists if living now in this age of evolution from belief in all gods and ghosts.

When sixteen years old Victor was competing for a prize poem. His mother was sick, and the sons took turns in sitting up at night to take care of her. The next day was the one on which the poems were to be handed in. Victor said he had been so busy he had not been able to write his.

The mother rebuked him gently, but he could not fail to notice how disappointed she was.

The moment she fell asleep Victor set to work and wrote steadily all night, and "the completed ode lay before her as a morning greeting. The manuscript that was sent forthwith to Toulouse, went after being first bedewed with a mother's tears."

The prize was won, and all were happy. Thus mother-love stimulated, encouraged, and aided in making Hugo the man we all so admire.

His "Devil Fish" is one of the most thrilling stories ever penned.

The "Man Who Laughs" is sad and melancholy in its tone, but a striking and effectiv work. "Les Miserables" is probably his most useful book. In it he pleads so powerfully the cause of the poor and miserable as to touch all hearts. This book was published simultaneously in Paris, Brussels, Leipsic, London, Milan, Madrid, Rotterdam, Pesth, Warsaw, and Rio Janeiro. Seven thousand copies were published in the original Paris edition, and all sold in two days! It is estimated that hundreds of thousands of them are in circulation everywhere. While admiring the successful author, let not the mother who created him be forgotten.

All honor to Sophia Hugo.

A New Creed.

I trust I am not intruding if I ask for a space in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER in which to offer a few suggestions as to the proper course for Liberals to pursue in propagating the principles of right and justice.

There is one thing that is too often apparent in the writings of Liberal people, and that is their disposition to attack and tear down the false ideas of the Christians. They too often expend their force in knocking down the shattered old hulk of theology and kicking its rotten framework about before the public gaze until we all get sick and disgusted, not only at the tattered ideas, but at the very force that is used to kick it about. I would suggest that this stop. Reasoning men and women are ready to admit to day that theology is a failure, and that the Bible is a fable, but they are not willing to see the church taken away from the world without something better to supplant it. They point to the good influence of the church organizations; they send their children to the Sunday-school, they recognize that the Young Men's Christian Association exerts a good influence over the young men, and they do not like to see these organizations swept away without something better offered them in their places. It is not enough for us to say that the Bible is a fraud and that theology is a myth; they will answer us and say the church is the source of good, that it checks and restrains men, and they do not care to giv it up, and in a measure they are right, for with all its false doctrins, and with its infamous past history, the church of to-day represents to some extent charity and virtue; at least it is worked behind the worth of these characters.

Now, what I suggest is that the thousands of Liberals in America shall meet and form a compact organization, that it establish itself in every community, that it form a code of morals, or religion, if you please, higher and purer and grander than the teachings of any church.

Let us say to the world that we are opposed to vice in every form—that while the church receives into its fold the drunkard, the libertin, and the criminal, the Liberals will require such a high standard of virtue that none of these can enter our charmed circle. The history of the church shows that it has fermented strife, that it has bred discord, that it has winked at treason and encouraged oppression in its most cruel form. Let us advocate temperance, purity, and truth. Let us promote peace, and say to the world that we come to bring peace, and not the sword.

Let us build schools and teach science. Let us build churches and teach the grand revelations of truth as revealed through nature, and not the faded dogmas of the Dark Ages. Let us fill our schools and churches with the choicest literature, and let our lecturers preach from Thomas Paine, Darwin, and other great lights of the world. Let us establish a new order of things, build up a new religion, and let the light of truth so shine that others, seeing our good work, may glorify the great source of truth and light.

I advocate a more thorough education of the young. I oppose marriage until our young men and young women understand fully the nature of the obligations they assume as husband and wife. I do not think a woman ought to swear eternal allegiance to a man who may turn out to be a drunkard or a criminal, and link her destiny for life with a physical wreck. Let our people insert a proviso in every marriage ceremony that will permit the wife or the husband to renounce their marriage vows if either should, by any criminal act, prove unworthy of their love and allegiance.

I want also to teach our fathers and mothers that they hav no natural right to inflict severe corporal punishment upon their children. I want the man to be ostracised who promulgates the horrid and barbaric idea of that infamous libertin, Solomon, that to "spare the rod is to spoil the child." Let us hav purer ideas of right and duty, and let us forever bury in the oblivion of the past the vulgar and barbaric teachings of the Bible. The way for us to effectually kill off the Christian religion is to establish a form of religion founded upon truth and right and reason; teach a purer and a higher system of theology, and good men and good women will flock to our organizations as weary pilgrims seek the shade of some friendly palm in the burning sands of the Great Sahara. WILLIAM WELLINGTON.

Our Schools.

Colonel Ingersoll in the World.

I believe that education is the only lever capable of raising mankind. If we wish to make the future of the republic glorious we must educate the children of the present. The greatest blessing conferred by our government is the free school. In importance it rises above everything else that the government does. In its influence it is far greater.

The school-house is infinitly more important than the church, and if all the money wasted in the building of churches could be devoted to education we would become a civilized people. Of course, to the extent that churches disseminate thought they are good, and to the extent that they provoke discussion they are of value, but the real object should be to become acquainted with nature—with the conditions of happiness—to the end that man may take advantage of the forces of nature.

I believe in the schools for manual training, and that every child should be taught not only to think, but to do, and that the hand should be educated with the braln. The money expended on schools is the best investment made by the government.

The school-houses in New York are not sufficient. Many of them are small, dark, unventilated, and unhealthy. They should be the finest public buildings in the city. It would be far better for the Episcopalians to build a university than a cathedral. Attached to all these school-houses there should be grounds for the children—places for air and sunlight. They should be given the best. They are the hope of the republic and, in my judgment, of the world.

We need far more school-houses than we hav, and while money is being wasted in a thousand directions, thousands of children are left to be educated in the gutter. It is far cheaper to build school-houses than prisons, and it is much better to hav scholars than convicts.

The Kindergarten system should be adopted, especially for the young; attending school is then a pleasure—the children do not run away from school, but to school. We should educate the children not simply in mind, but educate their eyes and hands, and they should be taught something that will be of use, that will help them to make a living, that will giv them independence, confidence—that is to say, character.

The cost of the schools is very little, and the cost of land—giving the children, as I said before, air and light—would amount to nothing.

There is another thing: Teachers are poorly paid. Only the best should be employed, and they should be well paid. Men and women of the highest character should hav charge of the children, because there is a vast deal of education in association, and it is of the utmost importance that the children should associate with real gentlemen—that is to say, with real men; and real ladies—that is to say, with real women.

Every school-house should be inviting, clean, well ventilated, attractiv. The surroundings should be delightful. Children forced to school learn but little. The school-house should not be a prison nor the teachers turnkeys.

I believe that the common school is the bread of life, and all should be commanded to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge. It would hav been far better to hav expelled those who refused to eat.

The greatest danger to the republic is ignorance. Intelligence is the foundation of free government.

Brotherhood of Moralists.

Report of the Propaganda Committee of the Brotherhood of Moralists, at Hannibal, Mo., for August, 1890.

SECRETARY'S REPORT.

During the month forty-eight membership certificates were issued, making a total membership of 1,157. The new members are from Alabama, Massachusetts, Nova Scotia, Idaho, Indiana, Colorado, Texas, Oregon, India, North Dakota, Missouri, and Michigan. The thanks of the committee are due several friends for Liberal papers, and names of persons known to indorse the principles of our Brotherhood. We hope others will follow their example, and also send a mite for the expense fund. F. H. RAU, Secretary.

THE Bible story of creation is only one of a large number of similar stories. We find, from a study of the Zend Avesta, that the Persian myth of creation is in many respects like the myth in the Bible, especially in reference to the alleged fall of man through eating of "forbidden fruit." Similar legends may also be found in Hindoo and Greek literature; upon the face of them all there is the stamp of a common origin.—Arthur B. Moss.

Gems of Thought.

SCIENCE knows that the safety of morality lies neither in the adoption of this or that philosophical speculation, or this or that theological creed, but in a real and living belief in that fixed order of Nature which sends social disorganization upon the track of immorality as surely as it sends physical disease after physical trespasses; and of that firm and lively faith it is her high mission to be the priestess.—Huxley.

LIBERALS are accused of lessening the restraints upon immorality by overthrowing the Bible doctrin of everlasting punishment; but they really are more severe toward sin than are the orthodox, for they do not encourage the sinner to believe that the consequences of lifelong crimes can be escaped by the lifting of the eye to the cross. They teach unavoidable injury from sin. Though men cease to hav the dread of eternal, hopeless torture before them, other motivs may be as serviceable. The perception of the advantage of goodness, a sense which is growing in man through the experience of ages, the certainty of the human retribution of crime, which social science will yet evolve, and the perception of the inevitable natural punishment which follows all wrong-doing—this hope and these fears will regenerate the world.—Robt. C. Adams.

IN each generation the human race has been tortured, that their children might profit by their woes. Our own prosperity is founded on the agonies of the past. Is it therefore unjust that we also should suffer for the benefit of those who are to come? A season of mental anguish is at hand, and through this we must pass, in order that our posterity may rise.—Winwood Reade.

To those who wished to put the war off to some future day, with a lofty and touching spirit of self-sacrifice, Paine said: "Every generous parent should say, 'If there must be war let it be in my day, that my child may hav peace.'"—Ingersoll.

IT is worth the while to liv respectably unto ourselvs. We can possibly get along with a neighbor, even with a bed-fellow, whom we respect but very little; but as soon as it comes to that, that we do not respect ourselvs, then we do not get along at all, no matter how much money we are paid for halting. —Thoreau.

THOMAS PAINE'S friends were untrue to him because he was true to himself, and true to them. He lost the respect of what is called society, but kept his own.—Ingersoll.

I THINK it would puzzle Mr. Lilly or anyone else to adduce convincing evidence that, at any period of the world's history, there was a more wide-spread sense of social duty, or a greater sense of justice, or of the obligation of mutual help, than in this England of ours. Ah! but, says Mr. Lilly, these are products of our Christian inheritance; when Christian dogmas vanish, virtue will disappear too, and the ancestral ape and tiger will hav full play. But there are a good many people who think it obvious that Christianity also inherited a good deal from paganism and from Judaism, and that if the Stoics and the Jews revoked their bequest the moral property of Christianity would realize very little. And, if morality has survived the stripping off of several sets of clothes which hav been found to fit badly, why should it not be able to get on very well in the light and handy garments which Science is ready to provide?—Huxley.

MORAL truths hav been taught in all parts of this world. They were taught in India long before Moses lived; in Egypt long before Abraham was born; in China thousands of years before the flood. It would be impossible to prove the truth of a revelation simply because it contained moral truths. If it taught immorality, it would be absolutely certain that it was not a revelation from an infinitly good being. If it taught morality, it would be no reason for even suspecting that it had a divine origin.—Ingersoll.

ONE of the most obvious consequences of the doctrin of exclusiv salvation is, that it places the moral in permanent subordination to the dogmatic side of religion. If there be a Catholic faith "which except a man believe he cannot be saved," it is quite natural that men should deem it "before all things" necessary to hold it. If the purest moral life cannot atone for error, while a true religion has many means of effacing guilt, the mind will naturally turn to the doctrinal rather than to the practical side.—Lecky.

No one objects to any harmless ceremony; but the moment it is insisted that a ceremony is necessary, the reason of which no man can see, then the practice of the ceremony becomes hurtful, for the reason that it is maintained only at the expense of intelligence and manhood.—Ingersoll.

Our Picture Book.

I wish to speak just a few words in commendation of the picture book.

It is all and more than I anticipated—a volume calculated to impress forcibly on the mind those wrongs it wars against, and to imprint them indelibly and ineffaceably upon the memory. You can never forget a single one of them. Written words may pass away, spoken words be lost, but the pictures stay forever and forever.

My book lies on the table, and has a conspicuous and honored place among the redeemers of the age.

All honor to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Watson Heston.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

Mr. Wanamaker and Our Picture Book

A friend writes: "I hav two dollars in my pocket for the Picture Book when I hear that the postmaster-general will allow it to go through the mails. Why cannot he forbid it to be carried on the charge of blasphemy? If he would, might it not increase its sale, as prohibition did that old Russian fool Tolstoi's late book of trash?"

Our friend can send along his two dollars, and he will get the book.

There are some very good reasons why Holy John cannot prevent its circulation. Firstly, it is not blasphemous, unless it be blasphemy to expose the church. Secondly, there is no federal law against blasphemy. Thirdly, if the post-office refuses to carry it the express companies will do so for the same price. And we would make things as lively as we could for the post-office officials.

Therefore, Holy John can go to blazes for all we care.

The Teaching of the Christian Religion.

The arrogance of the evangelical Christians is, seemingly, without limit.

When Senator Beck, of Kentucky, died recently his brother Senators, as is customary, spoke of him words of eulogy to the world. Of Mr. Beck's religious opinions his colleague, Senator Blackburn, said: "He had been no sectarian in religion. He had held no creed; but he had believed that the truest and most sublime of all faiths was that which taught men to use their best endeavors for aiding and elevating their fellow-men. . . . His had been the religion of humanity. He had believed that a man who helped his fellow-men was doing God service. His life had been molded on that faith." And concerning the eternal destiny of this humane and generous spirit the speaker declared he "had no fear. If there were one soul at whose approach the pearly gates of the celestial city would offer freest entrance to its eternal glories, it would certainly be to the one which, in its life on earth, strove hardest to aid the weak, to shelter the defenseless, to lighten the burdens of the heavy-laden, and which brought the most smiles and the fewest tears to the children of the world. Let us rest in the belief that, after a life well spent, with its every duty faithfully performed, his soul at last has found eternal rest among the scenes of its creation in the presence of its God."

Now comes the Christian Statesman with these arrogant comments upon Senator Blackburn's words:

"When, in such services, the speakers engage in speculation on the highest themes of religion, and express opinions concerning the ground of man's acceptance with God and admission to a blessed immortality, Christian men hav a right to ask that the faith which is accepted by the great majority of the people of the United States shall not be lightly controverted or assailed. We are not questioning Senator Blackburn's right to hav his own opinions on these subjects, and on suitable occasion as a private citizen to declare them. But we maintain that as a representativ and law-maker for a people who are overwhelmingly Christian, he had no right in the Senate chamber to contradict the teachings of that revelation which is our only authoritativ source of knowledge concerning spiritual and eternal realities."

Why not? Are not Senators and other officials entitled to tell the truth once in a while at least? Must they lie about an Agnostic colleague by words or by deceiving silence? Can they not be allowed to be honest even at the tomb?

A few years ago a Methodist clergyman took it upon himself to giv Colonel Ingersoll a piece of friendly advice. "Although you may disbelieve the Bible," said the follower of Wesley, "you ought not to say so. That, you should keep to yourself."

"Do you believe the Bible?" asked Colonel Ingersoll.

The clergyman replied, "Most assuredly."

To which Colonel Ingersoll retorted, "Your answer conveys no information to me. You may be following your own advice. You told me to suppress my opinions. Of course a man who will advise others to dissimulate will not always be particular about telling the truth himself."

The Presbyterians at last hav got down to the level of the Methodists.

Of Senator Blackburn's description of Mr. Beck's faith, the Statesman goes on to say:

"All this could hav been said, for example, over the grave of John Stuart Mill, a man who testified that he had never known a single religious conviction or emotion; that, educated by an Atheist father, the religious side of his nature was a simple blank. Yet he spent his life in studies and labors which were of great benefit to his fellow-men, and battling against some of the greatest abuses which hav wronged our race. According to the teaching we hav quoted, 'his soul has found eternal rest in the presence of its God.' But this is not the teaching of the Christian religion. While it enjoins and produces charity and beneficence, it affirms with solemn emphasis that man owes duties to God, and that his fulfilment or neglect of these duties is taken into his account by his judge. It teaches that in mercy God has sent his son, Jesus Christ, 'that the world through him might be saved,' and that our eternal destiny depends on our acceptance or rejection of this heavenly mediator. This fundamental truth of the Christian religion Senator Blackburn, from his place in the Senate, saw fit to deny. We make no affirmation concerning the eternal destiny of the departed Senator. We leave him where his colleagues ought reverently to hav left him, in the hands of his maker and judge."

It is pretty plain to be seen that the Statesman would use asbestos envelopes for letters to Senator Beck, and address them downward. This man, whom the Statesman admits was "of upright life, of great intellectual ability, of sturdy independence of spirit, an honorable man, never stooping to mean or dishonorable artifices," is now in hell according to the judgment pronounced by the Christian God. It is nothing that he was humane, honorable, benevolent; that of him, like John Stuart Mill, it could be said he spent his life in studies and labors which were of great benefit to his fellow-men, and battling against some of the greatest abuses which hav wronged our race; that his religion was the feeling that he who helps humanity was doing the best possible service—all this is absolutely nothing, and because he did not believe that "in mercy God sent his son Jesus, that the world through him might be saved," and that his eternal destiny depended upon the acceptance or rejection of that son, he is now in hell and will remain there through endless ages, burning yet never consumed, suffering tortures for which there is no relief, dying by inches yet forever living to suffer greater pain!

And this is the fundamental truth of the Christian religion, designed by God and by him revealed to man in the "only authoritativ source of knowledge concerning spiritual and eternal realities!"

"Who can estimate the misery that has been caused by this most infamous doctrin of eternal punishment? Think of the lives it has blighted—of the tears it has caused—of the agony it has produced. Think of the millions who hav been driven to insanity by this most terrible of dogmas. This doctrin renders God the basest and most cruel being in the universe. Compared with him, the most frightful deities of the most barbarous and degraded tribes are miracles of goodness and mercy. There is nothing more degrading than to worship such a God. Lower than this the soul can never sink. If the doctrin of eternal damnation is true, let me share the fate of the unconverted; let me hav my portion in hell, rather than in heaven with a God infamous enough to inflict eternal misery upon any of the sons of men."

The Death Penalty.

Judging from the number of journals that hav copied our editorial pleading for the abolition of the death penalty, there is a strong sentiment throughout the country against what is called capital punishment. From east to west, north to south, the article has been approvingly reprinted by papers of all shades of thought except Christian. We know of no evangelical Christian who is not stubbornly and sternly in favor of the eye for eye and tooth for tooth doctrin. This indicates that, as usual, the heretics and every-day sort of folks must lead the way in this as in all other reforms.

There will undoubtedly be attempts when New York's legislature next meets to repeal the law condemning murderers to death by electricity. We hope the attempts will be successful. The effort will also be made to reënact the statute taking the life of homicides by the rope. This should not be accomplished. The present is a splendid time to try a little humanity upon criminals. The doctors are disagreeing, and while they are fighting it out is a good opportunity for their patients to get well.

We trust that the journals which hav taken sufficient interest in the matter to giv space to our protest will find room to urge upon the people the desirability of circulating Colonel Ingersoll's address before the New York State Bar Association, "Crimes Against Criminals." Upon this subject of legal killing he givs facts which are conclusiv, and points out the wickedness of continuing the practice. "What," he asks, "shall be done with the slayers of their fellow-men—with murderers?" and says: "It has been contended that the death penalty deters others—that it has far more terror than imprisonment for life. What is the effect of the example set by a nation? Is not the tendency to harden and degrade not only those who inflict and those who witness, but the whole community as well? A few years ago a man was hanged in Alexandria, Va. One who witnessed the execution, on that very day, murdered a pedler in the Smithsonian grounds at Washington. He was tried and executed, and one who witnessed his hanging went home, and on the same day murdered his wife. The tendency of the extreme penalty is to prevent conviction. In the presence of death it is easy for a jury to find a doubt. Technicalities become important, and absurdities, touched with mercy, hav the appearance for a moment of being natural and logical. Honest and conscientious men dread a final and irrevocable step. If the penalty were imprisonment for life, the jury would feel that if any mistake were made it could be rectified; but where the penalty is death a mistake is fatal. A conscientious man takes into consideration the defects of human nature—the uncertainty of testimony, and the countless shadows that dim and darken the understanding, and refuses to find a verdict that, if wrong, cannot be righted. The death penalty, inflicted by the government, is a perpetual excuse for mobs.

"The greatest danger in a republic is a mob, and as long as states inflict the penalty of death mobs will follow the example. If the state does not consider life sacred, the mob, with ready rope, will strangle the suspected. The mob will say: 'The only difference is in the trial; the state does the same—we know the man is guilty—why should time be wasted in technicalities?' In other words, why may not the mob do quickly that which the state does slowly?

"Every execution tends to harden the public heart—tends to lessen the sacredness of human life. In many states of this Union the mob is supreme. For certain offenses the mob is expected to lynch the supposed criminal. It is the duty of every citizen—and as it seems to me especially of every lawyer—to do what he can to destroy the mob spirit. One would think that men would be afraid to commit any crime in a community where the mob is in the ascendency, and yet, such are the contradictions and subtleties of human nature, that it is exactly the opposit. And there is another thing in this connection—the men who constitute the mob are, as a rule, among the worst, the lowest, and the most depraved. A few years ago, in Illinois, a man escaped from jail, and, in escaping, shot the sheriff. He was pursued, overtaken—lynched. The man who put the rope around his neck was then out on bail, having been indicted for an assault to murder. And after the poor wretch was dead, another man climbed the tree from which he dangled and, in derision, put a cigar in the mouth of the dead; and this man was on bail, having been indicted for larceny.

"Those who are the fiercest to destroy and hang their fellow-men for having committed crimes, are, for the most part, at heart, criminals themselvs. As long as nations meet on the fields of war—as long as they sustain the relations of savages to each other—as long as they put the laurel and the oak on the brows of those who kill—just so long will citizens resort to violence, and the quarrels of individuals be settled by dagger and revolver."

These are true statements, and it is because people are beginning to find out their truth that the sentiment against the death penalty is so widely spread. And is it a singular coincidence or effect following cause that the increase of humane feeling is noted just when the decrease of faith in evangelical Christianity is too apparent to be disputed?

Sunday and the State Fair.

The Sunday observance question is steadily coming to the front, and one incident in it in this state has been the discussion over keeping the state fair grounds open during the Sunday occurring during the exhibition (September 14th), but with what practical result we hav not yet learned.

The question was brought up by a proposition submitted to the directors on the affirmativ side, which brought out, as usual, a screech from the bigots. The proposition was not acted upon, but it was decided to obtain an expression of public opinion, and the directors particularly wanted the editors of the state to giv an opinion. Acting upon this hint, the Syracuse Herald sent out circulars to "all the secular and religious papers in the state," asking the editors to comment on the proposition and also to send the Herald a hundred-word expression of personal opinion on the subject. About one hundred and fifty responded, of which sixty six said yes, seventy-six said no, and eight, by asking for "conditions," very neatly straddled the fence. It is noticeable, though, that the papers of greatest influence and circulation are in favor, and if they rightly represent their constituencies the public are rather more in favor of than against Sunday opening of places of interest, education, and amusement. This is a decidedly pleasing state of affairs.

We notice that the Syracuse Herald sought editorial opinion impartially. We find the Evangelist and THE TRUTH SEEKER vigorously opposing each other; the Wesleyan Methodist and the Twentieth Century expressing diametrically opposit views; the Freethinker's Magazine and the Brazilian Missions differing widely. We find, of course, the Jewish Messenger and Jewish Tidings on our side of the controversy, and a great many more of the purely secular journals published in the larger cities. Mr. Pentecost's opinion is very brief—"Keep the fair open on Sunday." Mr Green preached a little sermon in this way:

"Certainly the state fair grounds should be kept open on Sunday. There can be no reasonable objection to it, and there are valid reasons too numerous to mention why it should be kept open on Sunday. As will suggest itself to everyone, it should be kept open for the especial accommodation of the workingmen, many of whom cannot afford to lose a day from their labors to attend it. And not only for the benefit of those who are specifically designated as workingmen, but for the benefit of all classes of people who, on Sunday, are free from their various avocations and, attired in their Sunday clothes, can then most conveniently attend the great exhibition. If it be necessary to close the fair for a day let it be any other day than Sunday, which, of all days of the week, will accommodate the most people. As a matter of course those who hav religious scruples against attending the fair on Sunday will be under no obligation to do so."

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER looked at the opportunity as one specially happy in affording him a chance to tell the people the truth about the preachers, and he said: "The state fair should be kept open on Sunday for the benefit of the people. The only objection comes from the preachers who think that their churches will remain empty if the people hav any other place to go. But this is no objection; because, if the churches cannot compete with the fair, the fault is not with the fair. And it is against the genius of our government to use law for the benefit of religion. Sunday is not the Sabbath of God at all. If any day is, that day is Saturday. Therefore, there can be no valid ground against making Sunday a holiday instead of a holy day. It is against public policy, good government, and human happiness, to try to take this country back to colonial times, when the people were under a theocracy and senseless Puritanism dominated in everything. We hav outgrown those garments, and to put them on again will make us ridiculous. They won't fit."

These are plain words about a class of men the public is wont to revere, and to call attacks upon, blasphemy, but the Syracuse Herald printed them and lost no subscribers. The New York Star said that it believed that if a vote could be taken by the people of the state the Sabbatarians would be snowed under. The Baptist Evangelist, true to the brutal instincts of pious tyrants, proclaimed that if the fair were kept open the penal code would be tested on the managers. The other opponent emitted the usual cry of "Sabbath desecration," and paid no attention to the facts in the case.

What is learned from the collection of opinion is that about one-half of the papers of the state favor free Sunday, and that this half comprises the journals which circulate in the most civilized portions of the state.

New York's Public Schools.

The Sun says there are thousands of cases like this, as described in a letter to that journal, which explains itself:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN, Sir: The heading to your article on New York's schools, in the Sun of even date, says:

"'Official ignorance, indifference, and incapacity hav left us far behind the times, and heavily handicapped New York children for the race of life—wrongs that call for remedies.'

"And I want to say that it is all true—too infernally true. I am a New Yorker, and hav a boy of school age. He has been attending our city schools for four years, with the exception of six months, when he attended a school down in Maine. He learned more in those few months than he ever learned in three and a half years of New York's schools. Had he not been taught at home he would not now be as far advanced as a six-year-old boy in a country school in New England. He did not go back to school here on the 8th. I hav found a private school in a neighboring state—a much better place for him. E. M. M.

"New York, Sept. 10, 1890."

On the day following appeared a paragraph by one of the Sun's own writers relating a conversation overheard between two women in a street car, running like this: "No, my Harry has not changed his school. We hav moved away eleven blocks from the old school, but he says he would rather stay and walk the distance. If he changed they would put him back two classes, just as they did once before. Those women teachers are awful cranks. They hav their favorits, and they promote them whether they learn anything or not, and those whom they don't like they snub and keep down all the time. My girl was a favorit with her teacher, and was kept running up and down stairs and on errands and learning nothing, and so I took her out of school and sent her to work down town. I think it's just awful the way these teachers do. They hav their own way, and nobody must dare question them, and they treat the children like dirt under their feet. Why, there's one big woman in the school who has a voice like a steam whistle and a hand like a ham, and she screeches at the children so that you can hear her across the street, and the little things are as afraid as death of her.' Audience and speaker rose at this point and left the car, leaving a quiet man in the corner wondering whether it is true that the teachers whom the people pay are tyrants to the people's children."

Neither one of these writers told all that ought to be said against the incompetency of our public school teachers—the first because the Sun would not hav printed it, the second, possibly, because he didn't know it.

The fact is, our schools are a part of the spoils of the political profession. The politicians use them as places in which to pension relativs. Incompetent women and half-educated and all-inexperienced girls are made teachers, and the children suffer as a consequence. Most of the teachers are appointed through the influence of Tammany Hall workers, and naturally are Irish-American Roman Catholics. We printed several weeks ago the remark of one of them that she "would not hav a boy in this class without he went to mass." That remark shows at once the bigotry of many of the teachers and their capability as instructors. A year or so ago another teacher told the writer of the letter to the Sun that she had the right to, and would, teach his child religion, anything he might say to the contrary notwithstanding. It is hardly necessary, but it may be well to add that she did no such thing.

There is a great deal being said this fall by the papers about the schools, and various remedies for acknowledged defects are proposed. But the starting-point of reform should be to take the schools out of the politicians' hands, then take religion out of the schools, and finally to get more capable teachers than half-educated daughters and nieces and friends of Mike Corrigan's political strikers.

Our Pious Politicians.

The following paragraphs appeared in the Herald of the 10th instant:

"It was announced at the headquarters of the People's Municipal League yesterday that ninety per cent of the clergymen appealed to to coöperate with the movement hav sent in replies promising hearty support.

"A curious fact, however, is that no Catholic clergymen hav deemed it necessary to express an approval of the clergy entering politics. Managers of the League hope for a conversion before election day."

There is not an editor or an editorial writer or a reporter of any intelligence upon any of the daily journals of this city that does not know just why the Catholic clergy do not join in the opposition to Tammany Hall. But there is not one of them that dares to print the truth—to tell the public that the Roman Catholic church is by hook and by crook getting hundreds of thousands of dollars annually from the public treasury, and that Tammany officials are the hooks and crooks which obtain the plunder for her.

The Protestant clergymen are willing enough to join the so-called citizens' movement, for they desire the power now held by Mr. Corrigan's church to be transferred to them. Their movement is a humbug.

What is needed is that the papers should tell the truth and that the citizens, without regard to religion, should unite to dethrone Tammany and then make the practical union of church and state now existing impossible in future years.

But it is not likely to be done.

THE Prohibition organ, the Voice, says:

"The infidel who insisted that he could hav improved upon this world by making health contagious as well as disease, was abashed to find ont that health is contagious."

Colonel Ingersoll is not likely to be so much abashed at anything as at the colossal impudence and mendacity of the writers for religious periodicals.

THERE was a queer affidavit published in the Hebrew Observer, Cleveland, O., recently. Mr. John Hoffman was the relator, and his claim to fame is the fact that he was once converted from Judaism to Christianity by the Rev. Jacob Freshman, the son of a rabbi, who conducts the Hebrew-Christian church in this city. Mr. Hoffman, who resides at 96 Bowery, appears to hav been a convert for cash, for he first seriously considered the divine origin of Christianity after Mr. Freshman had obtained for him employment in a Murray street store. He was baptized and became a regular attendant at Mr. Freshman's church. But shortly his eyes "became opened to the peculiar methods employed by Mr. Freshman to secure converts, and the disreputable characters of many of those who posed as his disciples." He was also requested by Mr. Freshman "from time to time to bear testimony in public of my adherence to my adopted creed, and was invariably paid by him fifty cents for doing so." Mr. Hoffman likewise found—upon reflection, as he alleges, but perhaps owing to the small wages paid for bearing testimony—that the arguments Mr. Freshman employed to convert him could not bear "serious scrutiny," and so he backslid into Judaism. Our own opinion is that he may hav been helped in this by Mr. A. Benjamin, a Jew, who is waging a persistent war upon the Hebrew-Christian church. Be this as it may, it has "now been for some time evident" to Mr. Hoffman "that the mission is conducted mainly for the purpose of deluding the Christian public into the idea that good work is being done by it so as to obtain financial support for those who run it." Mr. Hoffman concludes his affidavit by the charitable opinion that Mr. Freshman's "strength lies in his ability to approach young men on the verge of despair, and by applying to their baser feelings induce them to abjure the faith of their fathers for what is a pecuniary consideration." All of which we think is queer for both parties.

Letters from Friends.

CHARLESTON, VT., Sept. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much pleased with the picture book. It is all I expected and more, too. A. F. COLL.

MOLINE, ILL., Aug. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $2 for the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book." I sometimes think the brainless heads in Congress will giv the croaking hypocrits a patent-right to run their heaven and hell. Y. E. MCCLENDON.

PRESCOTT, IA., Sept. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is the most valuable paper that I ever read. I cannot do without it. You can take away my dinner if you choose, but do not take away that which nurtures and is food for the mind.

Yours respectfully, GEO. S. FARNHAM.

SPENCER, IA., Aug. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am a great admirer of your paper and read it each week with accumulated interest. I believe that you are performing a grand and noble work, and that your influence and efforts for freedom of opinion and thought are even reaching the far West. THE TRUTH SEEKER and its principles are bound to win in the near future.

Yours truly, R. JACKSON.

SEATTLE, WASH., Aug. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: You will find $2 inclosed, for which please send me one copy of your book containing Heston's cartoons. I think it will be a good work to hav on hand to entertain my Christian friends when they call. I believe it will be worth ten thousand copies of the "Holy Queer," as Brother Slocum calls the Bible. Wishing success may crown your efforts in behalf of our grand religion, I remain, as ever,

Yours, R. J. WILSON.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA., Sept. 2, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I think oil for the machinery necessary, so I inclose $3—$2 for the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," and $1 on subscription. I think the book will be one of the grandest books to entertain our mistaken friends on ever written by our progressiv thinkers. I send a few names of individuals that probably might take THE TRUTH SEEKER, also a few clippings out of our county paper.

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, FRANK EVANS.

SELLWOOD, ORE., Aug. 31, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: There are here a large mass of both young and old men who do not believe in anything, but they are so sound asleep that I cannot hire them to read anything except the pictures in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which they look at over and over again. Even people who belong to the church laugh at the Bible cartoons. I inclose $20 for books and subscriptions. If you hav any left of the books containing the cartoons I will get one next time. I will send for more books. The reason that people are so slow to imbibe Liberalism is that it does not scare or promis anything, either in this world or the next—if there is a next world.

Yours respectfully, H. L. LINDOLEAF.

OSCEOLA, IA., Aug. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of your valuable paper so long that it seems as though I cannot do without it. By the reading of a few numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, this new subscriber I send, and his family, six in number, all grown, hav been converted to Liberalism. Only think what power there is in an Infidel truth; it has as much converting power as a thousand dollars of Christian money—as that is the cost of every convert to the church.

I see occasionally some one not pleased because there has been something admitted in your paper that is different from his way of thinking. To me that is what makes it so valuable. If there is anything to be held up to look at I would say, "Turn it around so that I may see the dark spots as well as the bright ones." R. JONES.

BLACK CREEK, O., Aug. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed money for the "Pictorial Text-Book." I am for the pictures. I want the portrait of the man that draws them. I would hav it in oil painting if I was only able, and hung in our hall that people might see the man who deals such deadly blows at superstition. And John Peck—I should like to see him around. He does much good. And there is Will Andres, our Ohio man—we feel the worth of him. He is always ready with a reasonable answer to preacher, priest, or pope. I always look with anxiety to see if our sisters Ella E. Gibson, Helen Gardener, Lucy N. Colman, etc., are on hand. It does much good to see woman scaling the Freethought hight, and there is joy unspeakable to the climber. I pity the woman who is a slave to the church, willing to work to support a preacher, a parasite, an impostor. Let us be up and doing; the work is already begun, and it is for us to keep the ball rolling. I expect to hav a good time when my book arrives. ELLEN THOMAS.

QUINCY, ILL., Aug. 31, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Your picture book came a few days ago, and to say I am well pleased with it is but faint praise, and but poorly conveys my sentiments of gratitude for so much truth that "the fool, though a wayfaring man," may comprehend the dark ways and plans of the priesthood. Your pictures are not caricatures, but more than gospel truths, and I do hope that your book may hav as large a circulation as Harper's Weekly had during our late unpleasantness, for which Nast should hav his due share of credit. Your pictures are all to the point, so much so that it is almost impossible to say which one of them should take the prize.

Has Wheeler's "Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers" been published on this side of the big pond? When it is I shall want a copy of it. It might very properly be called "The Lives of the Saints," as we Freethinkers are certainly the saints, preëminently. JOHN L. MOORE.

[The "Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers" has not been published in this country, but it contains notices of American the same as of European Freethinkers. If you mean, can it be procured in this country? we reply that we can furnish the work, as we import any foreign books wanted.—ED. T. S.]

BYRON, MINN., Aug. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 for one copy of your "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-book." I want it to show to the preacher when he visits me, as it is customary to hav the best when the man of God calls to see what value you hav on your soul. I hope Mr. Heston will soon return, improved in health and in the best of spirits, as I am commencing to get lonesome without his pictorial illustrations of our saints (?) and hell of a—oh, excuse me, I mean holy book. I think with this book we may be able to convert some of the heathen, and bring them into the folds of Good.

Illinois is progressing in the Christ business faster than any other state I hav heard of lately. At Rockford, of that state, the Holy Ghost is getting in his work in good shape. Three children hav been born to him, so a reverend gentleman says who is doing a little heaven and Holy Ghost business on the side. Now, that is business; a preacher who can run heaven and do a general Holy Ghost business ought to get a good salary. I hope he won't send a young Christ up here in Minnesota of a hog-drowning kind, as pork is quite high, and there is material enough in our churches to drown all the swine we hav.

I hav completed arrangements for bringing Mr. W. F. Jamieson and Rev. L. T. Nichols together in a debate to be held at Kasson, Minn. W. A. JOHNSON.

LONGSTREET, GA., Aug. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: A fine opportunity is offered for everyone who wishes to giv expression to his opinion through your Liberal paper, and hence in "Letters from Friends" we get the various shades of thought honestly spoken, and without fear. I presume all your readers hav read with interest the articles of T. E. Longshore, and especially that one on "The Immortality of Man," July 19th. I hav never read anything from the pen of any writer, whether Deist, Atheist, Theist, Pantheist, Materialist, or orthodox Christian (so called), that seems to be quite so reasonable and consistent with what we know. As the mind or imagination of man can hav no possible conception of a beginning of life and things, nor of the end of life and things, and as we know that life and things exist, we must conclude all alike are eternal, and all organized life is immortal. I think Aunt Elmina will admit this.

Well, let that question rest there. Now I want to ask Friend Longshore one question. When you say, "Even if he were to become extinct, as an organized being, the forces that constitute him a man would still exist somewhere dormant in nature, maintaining their immortality," do you mean to say or to admit that life force can by any possibility exist in a dormant state—lie dormant in nature for one-millionth part of a second? If that be so, then your immortality must end right there. That terrible word "if" creates the trouble, for the impossible—the anti-natural—cannot be supposed to exist. T. N. MASON.

CENTERVILLE, UTAH, Aug. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the last copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER that you now hav ready for sale the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-book," so I ask you to please send me the book as soon as you can. I hope Mr. Heston is getting all right in his health again. In going to Colorado he went to a most wonderful country, grand and sublime.

I was much pleased with Mr. W. W. Walker's reply to Talmage. I think Talmage had better try his hand with some of his own silly ilk and let Infidels and Freethinkers alone. I think Talmage had better appeal to the Mormons for subscribers to his rascally Christian Herald.

I hav not the time now to say much to you, as I am getting ready to go into the mines of these mountains, but I like the tone of THE TRUTH SEEKER, also the tone of Miss Wixon with her "Children's Corner." So I say, go ahead and giv it to theology keen and square from every point, for I tell you the times now demand it. It seems to me that Christians ought to begin to know and understand that they hav come to a strange turn in the long lane they hav traveled so long. And they cannot turn back. So the best they can do is to throw up the sponge and say, "By thunder, it's no go!"

Long life to Heston and John Peck and all the Freethought fraternity and all you godless fellows at THE TRUTH SEEKER office that are sending your godless literature off by the wagon load. Yours for truth, WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

IPAVA, ILL., Sept. 4, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Send me two copies of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." I shall endeavor to swell the list as much as possible, because it is really necessary that the light should radiate. Talk about the pulpit saber strokes and the Young Women's Christian Temperance Union's distant cannonading carrying the day for God. Why, the people hav grown tired of the preachers picturing the cross tragedy Sunday after Sunday. They are asking for a change. The pulpit thundering the bloody sacrifice no longer acts as a stimulant to lead the credulous to throw their hard-earned money into the contribution-box where the credit depends upon the faith. When the preacher tells his audience that the ungodly killed Christ, some student of history takes him to task about it, and what is the consequence? Why, that Infidels, Atheists, or Agnostics did not hav anything to do with the deed, because Christ, if he lived at all, was an Infidel, and was put to death by the true believers in the Jew God. They believed Christ was an impostor and they put him to death for non-conformity to their law. THE TRUTH SEEKER is educating the mind to investigate. Many who once were blind now see the truths that hav long been hidden, and Heston is picturing indelible paintings upon the retina that will increase in beauty with age. The electric words that fall and hav fallen from Colonel Ingersoll's lips hav bettered the earth, and many who once worshiped hav said, "Fare ye well, brother manikins," and as true as the needle points to the pole preachers will hav to work like other people. Let facts be submitted to a candid world and preachers will quit lying on credit. C. S. RANDOLPH.

WORCESTER, MASS., Sept. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: As I seldom see a letter from old Massachusetts in your excellent paper, I thought I would let you know that there are still a few brothers and sisters in the cause in this part of the country. We hav no organized society here at present, but I hope we may hav at some future time. The "Pictorial Text-Book" arrived a short time since, and we were much pleased with it. We miss the cartoons sadly, and hope Mr. Heston will soon be able to resume them. The objectors hav had a chance to see how they like the paper without them, and I imagin they will look as eagerly as any of us for them again.

A missionary that preached in church here last Sunday told this little story, which, by the way, I don't think helped his side very much. An Indian chief was asked by a white man what benefits he had received by serving the Lord. The Indian said he was poorer than he was before, and that he had received no apparent benefits, but still he found pleasure in serving the Lord. I think many members will agree with him in the first two statements, for they certainly do not get rich, but I read the other day of a poor evangelist who died worth $50,000.

At the risk of using what is considered a very unladylike word, I will tell a little incident that happened here not long ago. There was to be a meeting in which the ministers of all denominations were to take part. They met to assign the different parts, and one was asked if he would pray. He hesitated, and then said, "No, I don't care to. The fact is, I can't pray worth a damn." How is that for a minister?

Hoping that all your readers enjoy their paper as much as we do, I will close. MRS. A. J. CLARK.

BAYNE, KAN., Aug. 18, 290.

MR. EDITOR: When I read the "Letters from Friends" and see how they are sending in their mites to sustain the grandest cause ever projected, it makes me feel as though I ought to do more. A tree is known by its fruit; that is the way to judge Freethought papers and Freethinkers. For my part, I had rather be in hell with a man like F. A. Day, of Castana, than be waltzing around the gold-paved streets of the New Jerusalem with Dave and Solomon and Uriah's wife while old Gabe tooted his fog-horn.

We are very hard run; not one bushel of corn shall we get this year off a quarter section—dried up completely. It has not rained in six months. But we must hav THE TRUTH SEEKER if eggs are only four cents a dozen. Find inclosed $5—$2 50 on my subscription, $2 for the "Pictorial Text-Book," balance for other books as below. Here is what I hav been thinking about: Crops hav failed here. I hav rented my farm for the next year, and I propose to go down through Texas and visit some of the Freethinkers, and will sell the Freethinkers' Bible wherever I can. I hav been of the opinion for years that if a brave man would carry the war into Africa he would meet with success. I was at our county seat where a Salvation wagon was doling out their slush, principally by praying. I preached to that wagon of eight about five minutes, and they left. I told them what the Bible said about making long prayers on the corners of the street, and that if they ate of the bread of life it did not put the rose of health upon their cheeks. When will that Bible be printed? I hav three others engaged. If you will send them to me when you send the one I hav ordered, I will see that you get your pay. I intend to send you a new subscriber. I hav tried hard, but failed so far. A. BUTTERFIELD.

BLOOMDALE, O., Aug. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav a few more trifles, "light as air," to tell, that might amuse some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, if not instruct. We hav a good Catholic staying in town who on last Friday abstained from eating meat, but for breakfast he ate nine eggs and for supper eight, and for dinner I do not know what he had.

I wanted to say also that long before I was married I made the remark that no priest should ever perform that ceremony for me and none but an Infidel women should ever be my partner, and it is now fourteen years since I was married and it was done by an alderman at Big Falls, and my wife is just as confirmed an Infidel as yourself. Further, I want to say that our three children were not baptized and do not go to Sunday-school. I am forty-two years of age, and hav never given one dollar to the cause of Christianity and never will. I never go near churches and will not giv them even a seeming support.

Now a few words on Spiritualism. To my mind it is a bag of wind, a something without a backbone. Of all the communications that were ever received from a pretended other world either in Bible mention or modern times, not one seems to be of any consequence or importance either in reference to a future life or to the present. We are not told in unequivocal terms that there is a life beyond or that we should look for it and shape our actions accordingly. We are not told anything that could pass for definit knowledge that might assure us of the reality of it. The speech of Balaam's ass threw just as much light on the subject as all that followed. If any single one of all the communications received had given one ray of light to assure us in a convincing manner of the position, we might take stock in it.

Will you kindly answer this question: Is the tenement property of Trinity church, New York city, free from taxation? Yours, etc., A SUBSCRIBER.

[Trinity's tenement property is taxed.—ED. T. S.]

OPEN LETTER TO MR. CHARLES A. DANA.

NEW YORK, Sept. 5, 1890.

MR. DANA, Fellow-Citizen: In the New York TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 30, 1890, page 553, you hav been said to hav said that "one rule for getting rich is to mind your own business."

Now, what is one's "own business?" Is it not the "business" of a sovereign to manage his government? I am a sovereign citizen of the United States. Is it not strictly my "business" to manage, to the extent of my ability, our government? Is the firm of Dana, Bennett, Pull it sir & Co. to dictate to this sovereign citizen as to what is, or is not, his "business?" Mr. Dana, do not be a rebel—against humanity.

When Jeff. Davis and his pals (rebels against all decent humanity) were buying and selling their own mulatto daughters and sons in slavery, and outraging the persons of their own pretty mulatto daughters, and those of their neighbors, in servil concubinage, overriding, outraging, and misconstruing our Constitution of the United States, in which neither of the words slavery, slave, negro, African, black, yellow, mulatto, servant, servitude, or white ever occupied place till put into the XIII Amendment by the Republico-rebel wing of the Democro-Republico-rebel party, at the close of the slavemongers' Rebellion, they, too, said, "Let us alone!" "Mind your own business!" That, Mr. Dana, is the sentiment of every villainous, guilty scoundrel, "Mind your own business!"

The man who manages a newspaper should be a decent, honest man.

The last clause of Sec. 2, Art. IV, of our Constitution of the United States, is, at the present time, constituting a part of that great document, and on it the villains on our Supreme bench, and elsewhere, based their infamous outrage called "the Fugitiv Slave law." Did Messrs. Dana, Bennett, Pull it sir & Co. ever raise pen or voice against it?

"Mind your own business!" By that word "justice," in the preamble, and that word "people," in the IV Amendment to that Constitution, slavery was as effectually abolished, in the minds of all honest "people," from its very beginning, as language could be made to do it.

Mr. Dana, think a little; take THE TRUTH SEEKER and seek the truth, and be assured that all intelligent truth seekers will "mind our own business."

Respectfully your fellow-citizen, G. N.

SIGNAL, O., Aug. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The church is the house where wolves come together dressed in sheep's clothes, to unite in phantasy laid down for them. It is the house of the sanctified ignoramus. Religion is the narrow-mindedness of a superstitious imagination of an undeveloped brain, which has no foundation to rest on. The god which is true to nature, having the laws of nature, being nature, itself is the supreme power, not only over the human animal, but over the whole solar system. The god is not a being, but a law. Law is power, and it is the law and power of nature which is god. We hav to do according to nature and its laws to be successful. If we go against nature and the laws which are set before us, we will make a failure. This god is above prayer and worship. He does not need them or care for them. But he wants not only obedience, but also fulfillment of his laws, which is honesty, love, and truthfulness toward our fellow, friend, and brother. This is not church and Bible religion, but god's religion, which is the religion of humanity. There is no need for a day of atonement, church, minister, singer, mediator, or an attorney of religion to plead for us, as god, which is nature, is just and honest, and he will giv us what is justly due to us without a prayer, or a representativ or attorney to plead for us. For honest toil, honest labor, comes honest pay without prayer. The blessings and curses of this world are in our power.

If we serve nature and giv it its dues, nature will serve us in return and giv us our dues. Do not think that if I steal, lie, murder, etc, with full orthodox faith, the day of atonement will save me. No, I must suffer for it right here on earth, which is itself hell-fire, brimstone, torture, and condemnation. Or, if I jump into a blazing fire with full faith that God will save me from burning, do you think he will do so? Study humanity if you please; you will come to the conclusion that death, life, health, sickness, wealth, poverty, honesty, rascality, honor, disgrace, good and bad society, are in every man's reach.

Men being mortal, there is no known or unknown hereafter, no heaven nor hell. The Bible is untrue, and one chapter contradicts the other. It is contradictory to nature. It cannot stand criticism, as the brain of humanity has developed. It is a bad book to read. We hav better modern books. Some of its passages should be torn out and burnt. It is a disgrace to read them in front of refined ears of intelligent society. I, for my part, do not believe in this superstitious book in which my sectarian orthodox friends believe. The Bible is full of absurd, contradictory, superstitious so-called miracles, which is the great drawback of civilization. I do not need a day of atonement, nor a day for forgivness of sin, nor a day of fasts and prayer.

E. M. GEIGER.

SPENCER, IA., Aug. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith inclosed find an article published in the Spencer Reporter by A. C. Puterbaugh, a well-known writer of this county. The force and importance of the letter rests upon the fact that this county is populated by a set of religious zealots and bigots who hav opposed our little band of truth seekers in every way, and even deny us the privilege of thinking for ourselvs. This letter has created a sensation, and we think it well worthy of a repetition in your most instructiv paper, which although not generally subscribed for is read with great avidity. Even old church-members are wont to borrow it and read it on the sly, being destitute of the manly instincts to come out openly and say that the tenets which you hav so ably and tenaciously espoused are right, just, and must meet the approval of every liberal, candid, and honest-minded man. R. JACKSON.

The religious fervor which induced some fanatic to prosecute one of our fellow-townsmen for endeavoring to save his crops by selecting the Sabbath to accomplish that result, has caused quite a stir among the more Liberal-minded. The progress of civilization has extracted the theological tiger's teeth. She can bite no more. Yet sometimes we hear the hoarse growl of the enraged beast when some pioneer of Freethought ventures too near the bloodthirsty animal's den. Some of these zealots should remember they do not liv beneath the disgraceful reign of King Henry VIII., nor Charles IX., neither is King Philip II. of Spain waging a religious war against Holland, in this age of culture and intellectual, moral, and scientific progress. Nor are those hands that were once stained with the blood of innocent children searching for new victims, unless perhaps we see a counterpart in the pious fraud who has been instrumental in bringing about the prosecution of one who had the courage and energy to violate the Sabbath, that was only introduced by Constantine I., emperor of Rome, whose bloody, heartless conduct is evidenced in perpetrating about eleven murders. And yet beneath Constantine's fostering care that Sabbath first rose into prominence and favor. The writer firmly believes that he who would destroy the sacred right guaranteed to all beneath the stars and stripes, a right to worship God according to the dictates of his or her conscience, is unworthy to be recognized as a true and loyal friend of liberty. That liberty and freedom of thought that gave us a Constitution without being burdened with a religious obligation, is too dear and sacred to be trampled down in the dust by zealots and fanatics, who imagin the Lord will giv them a golden harp for standing as sentinels over the Jewish Sabbath and preventing an industrious, hard-working fellow-creature from saving his crops, when his little children depended on his labor for bread. A. C. PUTERBAUGH.

GORDONVILLE, TEX., Aug. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hope that you will allow me through the columns of your excellent journal to offer a few remarks as regards personal identity, recognition, and consciousness in heaven and in hell. To substantiate this idea the preachers quote the parable of Lazarus and the rich man (Luke xvi, 22–29), etc. Now, they appeal to the sympathies of sinners and disbelievers in this manner, trying to delude them—that one of their sweetest thoughts and greatest sources of pleasure is the conception of meeting their dear friends, their mothers, their fathers, their brothers, sisters, wives, and children. Now, where does this idea stop? If the parable is a true one can we not look also across the gulf and see our poor, unfortunate near and dear mothers, fathers, sisters, brothers, wives, and children eternally in agony and pain—hear their pitiful cries and moans? Ah, can we be so unprincipled as to only care for the happy and fortunate and hav no love or sympathy for the poor, unfortunate, and miserable? If angels of heaven are happy under these circumstances, how much better are they than angels of hell? How can any man of principle be happy and see his mother, father, sister, brother, wife, and children in eternal, hopeless, and helpless pain and misery? Now again, we are to recognize a man in heaven whom we knew on earth, a man who was an unprincipled wretch from his childhood; a man who was immoral, profane, untrue, dishonest, guilty of theft, murder, rape, and all kinds of infamy, but who at last was taken in his wild career and who after seeing himself fast in the hands of the law called upon Christ to remember him when he comes into his kingdom. Is this the kind of associates we are to hav in heaven? And, too, what is to become of the poor man who fell a victim to this man's murder—a man who had probably lived a moral and useful life until his death but had failed to call upon the name of the Lord?

And another obstacle: Many men die at an early age and their wives frequently marry again. Now, whose wives will these women be and how are they to be reunited? Now, if this be true, who can be happy in heaven?

Again, how is it that God cannot save? They say there is no other name given in heaven or among men whereby we can be saved. How is it that we are taught in Gen. i, 13, that God tempts not any man, and in Gen. xx, 1, are taught that God tempted Abraham?

Is a man's belief or faith subject to his will? Can a man believe a thing is true when everything proves it is false? Can a man believe anything is false when everything proves it is true? If I giv a man a quantity of sulphate of strychnin and think it is quinine and am quite sure that it will not hurt him, does that prevent its killing him? Can I believe that I can eat deadly poisons with impunity and they not hurt me? Then what justice can there be in damning a man for not believing a thing, whether he can believe it or not? Then I think that everyone should make a reasonable effort to do what he thinks sincerely to be right.

D. J. TUOKER, M.D.

RED CANON, WYO., Aug. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Freethinkers, Atheists, Spiritualists, all who admire such thought as we see expressed each week in THE TRUTH SEEKER, should not longer delay the plan of organizing a secret order. In the fight with religion we encounter no honest foe. With it we deal with a fiend, the despotic extract of ages of ignorance. If the Christians corrupt our Constitution, we shall be aliens under their constitution—but not untrue to that given us by the noble Freethinkers of Revolutionary days. The writer belongs to no secret societies, because there is a "God" in all of them, and men belong to them not so much for any high purpose which the order seeks to attain as for the greater "influence" the order will giv them. Liberals that speak out are boycotted in many ways through the secret action of religious bodies. It may be brave to stand alone, but effort can be made more efficient through organization. And the word organization means always some secret working. A secret order of Freethought will surely become an educating institution. Activ minds hunger for knowledge, and knowledge spreads most rapidly during vocal interchanges of thought. The church gathers thousands yearly to her fold that only go there for society's sake. In such a community the Freethinker must find his society as accident throws it in his way, and though church people are ever vocal on the subject of their dear religion, a Freethinker is regarded as a kind of monster who expresses his views, however modestly. There is no question about it; the fact is, it costs a Liberal more to express his views plainly and be known in society as an Infidel than it costs the church people to support their churches and missions. The bookseller or news-dealer who sells THE TRUTH SEEKER and like publications loses some Christian trade by so doing. Usually the editor of a little local paper, if he is an Infidel, cannot afford to speak out. With other trades and professions it is the same. There is not a saloon-keeper who would not lose custom if he decorated the bar with the cartoons of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A secret order of Liberals should be so secret even that its name should not imply its character, and orders should be established in a town in such a way that the people at large can no more than surmise their nature. Not only is the precept, "Mind your own business," a good motto, but also that of, "Keep your business to yourself," is equally as essential to success.

Not wishing to undervalue the efforts of those who do all they can in public conversation to promote the cause of Freethought, every Liberal can recall times when he has spoken his thoughts when their only observable result was the fact that he had made an enemy. Often that very enemy has in subtil ways injured him financially afterward. Suppose the words had not been spoken and the enemy had not been made; suppose the financial difference to the credit of the Liberal had been used to scatter Liberal literature over this town, would he not thus hav lent aid to those whose sole occupation is that of diffusing knowledge versus religion? And also would not $100 worth of Freethought literature spread through a town accomplish more than a tirade against some mental fossil in the shape of hypocrit or bigot?

Those toward whose conversion the church mainly directs her efforts are the young. Suppose some agent in the employ of a secret order of Freethought went from town to town distributing illustrated Freethought tracts, written in a manner that would interest children. Of course a storm of indignation would soon gather; but the agent would not transgress law if he handed the tracts to the children. Church people would want to hurt somebody, but the agent would not be dependent upon them for his living.

About the secret order the churches would know but little. They would be mad, so mad, and all this would advertise the literature, to the profit of the publishers.

The cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER are mighty engins in themselvs. All they want is the fuel in the shape of dollars to send them flying into every house.

No matter what Christian fossils might say, those cartoons would please the young and athletic mind. Even the fossil himself on the sly will enjoy looking at them.

A secret Liberal order can do work that individuals can not afford to do. Also it can educate, and make the lives of Liberals more social, thus more enjoyable. Furthermore, it will be a protecting power when the church has enthroned herself in the chairs of state.

Now is the time to organize, for stormy times are coming for Liberals by and by.

It is the organized, secret, and strategic that wins in business and warfare. They even win in church and politics. Why should they be ignored by Liberals?

But some one will say that what he does or says as a Liberal is for the whole world to know. Secrecy, he says, comes not up to his ideal of honesty. Yes, this is what religions hav declared, what priests and preachers hav taught. Why did they teach it? Because they wished to know all the masses did and thought and felt; that they might better handle their power over them. A man's business is his own; his thoughts his own; his acts, if not an injury to others, are his own affairs. Secrecy is not in itself a vice or crime. It is its own master—independent. Neither is it stamped with dishonesty, or careless in its honesty.

The scriptural advice, "Take no thought of the morrow," bears close analogy to the one often quoted by honest people, "Let your acts be known by all men." Both indicate improvidence, wastefulness. He who lays up no treasure on earth, to be consistent should keep no secrets either. There is an extreme to honesty that is folly, as well as one to benevolence that means wastefulness.

I hope any who hav arguments to offer against the propriety of a secret Liberal order will trot their arguments out. Friction is necessary to warm up Liberals on the subject, and those who do not favor the ideas herein presented can aid them somewhat by flinging their hot shot against them. Let the question be open for debate. Will secret work do more than public work to aid the cause of Freethought?

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Factory Girl's Last Day.

[A girl of a poor man's that I was called to visit was poorly. She had worked in a mill. I was obliged to attend the child as overseer of the poor By and by she went back to work again, and one day the father came to me with tears in his eyes. I asked, "What's the matter?" He said, "My little girl is dead. She died in the night. and what breaks my heart is this: She went to work in the mill in the morning; she was not able to do her work, and a little boy said he would assist if she would giv him a penny on Saturday. I said I would giv him two pennies; but at night when the child came home she fell several times through exhaustion till at length she reached the door, and she never spoke audibly afterward. She died in the night." She was about ten years old.—AUTHOR.]

'Twas on a winter's morning,
The weather wet and wild,
Three hours before the dawning
The father roused his child.
Her daily morsel bringing,
The darksome room he paced,
And cried, "The bell is ringing,
My hapless darling, haste."

"Father, I'm up, but weary;
I scarce can reach the door,
And long the way, and dreary.
Oh, carry me once more.
To help us we've no mother,
You've no employment nigh,
They killed my little brother;
Like him I'll work and die."

Her wasted form seemed nothing.
The load was at his heart.
The sufferer he kept soothing
Till at the mill they parf.
The overlooker met her
As to the frame she crept,
And with his thong he beat her,
And cursed her as she wept.

Alas! what hours of sorrow
Made up her latest days;
Those hours that brought no morrow
Too slowly passed away.
It seemed as she grew weaker,
The threads she often broke,
The rapid wheels grew quicker,
And heavier fell the stroke.

The sun had long descended,
But night brought no repose,
Her day began and ended
As cruel tyrants chose.
At length a little neighbor
Took half-penny pay
To do her last half-hour's labor,
While by her frame she lay.

At last the engin ceasing.
The captive homeward rushed,
She thought her strength increasing—
'Twas hope her spirits flushed.
She left, but oft she tarried;
She fell, and rose no more
Till by her comrades carried
She reached her father's door.

All night, with tortured feelings,
He watched his speechless child,
And close beside her kneeling
She knew him not nor smiled.
Again the factory's ringing
Her last perceptions tried,
When from the straw bed springing,
"'Tis time!" she shrieked, and died.

[Not much can be thought of a father who would permit his little daughter to work in a mill till she dropped dead from exhaustion. Such a man was unworthy to be a parent.—ED C. C.]

Life in the Backwoods.

'Twas fifty years ago or so, that Benjamin Stirling lived in the town of B—— in Massachusetts. He was poor and so was his farm. There was no depth to the soil, and the surface was strewn with rocks and stones. Hence, as he had no money to spend for fertilizing purposes, his crops were scanty indeed. His house was poor and rickety, his barn likewise, his cattle were thin and lank, his out-buildings and fences partook of the general forlorn appearance, and passers-by did not need to be told that the owner of the place was not prosperous, or likely to be so while he remained in such a poverty-stricken region.

In the Stirling home was a wife and four children, Addie, Maria, Kate, and Tony, their ages ranging from ten to sixteen years. Perhaps the general dilapidated condition of the farm was due, in some degree, to Mr. Stirling's irresistible desire to travel; for, often while at work in his garden, there would come over him a strong impulse to go somewhere, when he would drop his hoe, or whatever other implement he had in hand, and off he would start, without saying a word, or stopping at the door to bid the folks good-bye. After some six months, or a year, maybe, he would suddenly appear again. But, although he usually had some scheme in mind to better his condition, he generally returned as empty-handed as he went away.

The last trip he made he was gone a year. He seemed pleased to get back, and, after dinner, he began fumbling in his pockets.

"What hav you got, pa?" inquired Kate.

With grim humor, he replied, "I hav got back."

The little ones who had clustered around him with eager curiosity, drew away from his knees at this cool reply.

He slowly pulled from his pocket the old red bandanna that was an heirloom, and large enough for a shawl for Kate or Maria.

He also took from his pocket a pound of tobacco, given him, he said, by a fellow-traveler. This man had also given him such a glowing picture of Canada that he had firmly resolved to emigrate to that country with all his family. Land was cheap and easy to work, and to Canada he was bound to go. So, without much deliberation, on the 1st of April following they pulled up stakes, and away they went and took up their abode in a little log hut close to the edge of a deep, dark forest. The nearest neighbor lived four miles away, and, if possible, life was more dark and dubious than ever. But wife and children were hopeful and happy. Not so, Benjamin. In the autumn he became quite discouraged, and started off for a tramp to Virginia, where after a sojourn of a few months he died of a southern fever.

Well, did the wife and children lie down and die, too, away off there in the backwoods?

No, they were brave souls, and they resolved to battle for life and keep the wolf of starvation from the door of their log home.

Mrs. Stirling possesssed energy, determination, will, and great resolution. She knew how to spin and weave, and was in every sense a plucky, wide-awake Yankee woman, and hence she soon found employment at her neighbor Bruce's.

The way to his house was through the dense and pathless woods, the path being marked by the blazed trees.

She often heard the cry of the wolf and other wild animals as she traveled backward and forward. For her work in the farm-house she received, not money, but its equivalent, such as potatoes, meal, meat, etc.

One night in February, when she arose in the morning, she found the snow level with the roof of her hut, and weather cold enough to freeze one with less courage than she possessed. Her ax was buried under the snow and she had but little wood, and that little was soon consumed in keeping up the fire. One by one she took the pieces of furniture and burnt them, for her little ones must not freeze and the cold was bitter and intense. No vestal virgin of ancient days ever guarded altar fires more sacredly. Toward night her courage began to fail, the fire was burning low, and the cold was fiercer than ever. When hope was nearly gone, however, she heard a sound of voices. O joy! it was Farmer Bruce and his three stalwart sons, with oxen, snowplows, and shovels come to her relief. She had kept her children in bed all day that they might be warm, but now they were soon up and dressed.

Oh, how glad they all were to see their good friends, the Bruces! How they laughed and frolicked! With what glee they looked upon the bucket full of ox-tail soup that thoughtful Mrs. Bruce had sent them, together with preserves, ham, bread, and other good things. The table was soon spread, and the hungry mouths filled, for they had not broken fast for the day until then.

The young men parched corn, cracked the nuts that they had brought, and witty joke and repartee were passed along like rippling music.

Tom Bruce laughed and chatted merrily about Addie and Maria being such early risers. They sang rollicking Canadian songs. Ralph and Hugh, the half-breeds that accompanied the Bruces, sang the same in their own language. The Bruce lads became quite frequent visitors. They were bright, stalwart boys, and minded not the cold, the snow, or the distance. Their visits broke the monotony and dullness of the long winter evenings.

One time Mrs. Bruce had a quilting-bee, and invited all the Stirlings to be present. How nimbly the fingers of the neighbors flew, for all the neighborhood around were there. How they quilted, knotted, and tied the comfortables! Then, of course, after the manner of all quilting-bees, this one was closed by a great frolic. The little ones were put in a big room all by themselvs, with plenty of cookies and apples, and direction to enjoy themselvs to their heart's content. And they did. No restraint, no caution not to make a noise, but only bade to hav a good time and enjoy themselvs.

They played "blind man's buff," "tag," "lift the gates high as the sky, and let King George and his troops pass by," and other similar games. The older people had music, dancing, and conversation.

Oh, they had good times in Canada. But for all that Mrs. Stirling determined to return to the Old Bay State the following summer.

But how was she to get back? There was but one way for her and her family. They must go afoot. Disposing of the few things she had, she made ready for the journey.

Mr. Bruce accompanied them thirty miles on their way, indeed, taking Mrs. Stirling and the two younger children in his big team, while Tom Bruce took Addie and Maria in his new buggy, the same distance.

When they finally parted at the end of the thirty miles it was with deep and sincere regret.

It was a charming day. The emigrants had all their worldly possessions each in a small bundle, and the family tramped along with cheerful hearts, amid green fields, purling brooks, waving trees, wild flowers, and the song of the summer birds.

At night they brought up at a Dutch farmer's house, where they were made welcome, and a bountiful meal spread for them, to which they did ample justice. The old farmer in the morning took the little party on their journey a short distance, and gave directions as to the right road to take when he left them.

So they went on, and foot-sore and weary, arrived at length at a house of a Mr. Powers, who chanced to be a relativ of the old Dutch farmer. The emigrants by this time were beginning to be very tired, and the two younger ones were complaining of sore feet. At this house they met a tin pedler, who seemed friendly, and very kindly offered to take the two foot-sore children along on his big team. So they started on. The rest of the family jogged along behind the big red cart, which was loaded with brooms, pails, tin cans, and other articles of housekeeping.

All at once the pedler whipped up his horse, and was soon out of sight of the bewildered mother and the older children.

Ah, what had she done? Given her darlings in the keeping of an entire stranger.

About Reading.

TYNGSBORO, MASS.

EDITOR CHILDREN'S CORNER: That was a very good essay you published from Miss Stockinger on what to read. I send you an item from a paper on how to read, that it would be well for all the Corner folks to profit by. I know a man who attended school in Boston and London and Paris, and yet can not read aloud a single newspaper paragraph intelligently to his hearers or even himself, simply because he never learned to see what the words were before he spoke them, or how to pronounce them properly. There is nothing that is so slipshod in education as a poor reader. JOHN P. GUILD.

HOW CHILDREN READ.

The following article, from the New York Tribune, should arrest the attention not only of every school-teacher, but every parent as well, who has children attending the public schools.

"Several correspondents of the Tribune hav lately called attention to the prevailing incapacity of public school children to read well aloud. The indictment might hav included the pupils of private schools as justly. It is a fact of common observation that almost all children read badly, and that in consequence good reading among adults is much rarer than it ought to be. In the latter case the defect may be largely a matter of confirmed habit, and indicates nothing discreditable to the mental development of the delinquents. But in the case of children it is true, as a general proposition, that the ability to read well aloud is a pretty fair test of capacity in other directions. For this reason the complaint brought against the schools is a very serious one, since it implies much more than it alleges. A quick mind, general intelligence, and command of the eyes, the voice, and the facial muscles are essential to good loud reading, and a child of ten years or more who is unable to read agreeably and understandingly may without injustice be assumed to be deficient in these respects.

"We hav in mind a school in a New England village, the founder, proprietor, and principal of which had a singularly sound taste in literature, and made loud reading almost a hobby. Some of his boys did not learn much besides, but very few of them ever left him at any age without being able to read at sight fluently, understandingly, and agreeably. There were no parrots among them. They read well because they had been taught how to use their eyes and their voices, and had learned the difference between good and bad prose and poetry, the relations of words and ideas, and many other things which school-books say little about. And when they went to other schools and began the definit work of preparing for college, they found tasks very easy which were a burden to most.

"It would be hard to exaggerate the importance of this matter, or to criticise too severely teachers who neglect and parents who are indifferent to it. It is our deliberate opinion that, disregarding every other mental aptitude and acquirement, any parent might be well satisfied with a child of twelve years who was able to giv genuin pleasure to intelligent and impartial listeners by reading a piece of good literature aloud at sight."

News of the Week.

SOUTHAMPTON, Eng., has had a dock strike attended with violence.

SPEAKER REED has been returned to Congress from Maine with an increased plurality.

FRANCE is desirous of putting an end to missions and missionaries in its African provinces.

AT Spokane Falls, Wash., on the 6th, a premature explosion in rock-blasting killed fifteen men and injured more.

BRAZILIAN Catholics are straining every nerve to procure the defeat of the republican government in the coming election.

KNIGHTS of Labor say that forty persons hav been killed or injured on the New York Central railroad by employment of green hands.

CATHOLICS in France are enraged at the new law compelling young men studying for priests in seminaries to do military service like others.

A MARRIED couple at Maspeth, N. Y., hav been arrested for having received as baby farmers scores of infants and then killed or abandoned them.

THE census is said to be defectiv everywhere. New York's health board gives the city's population as 1,641,348, against the census 1,500,000.

SWISS Radicals last week raised a revolution against the government, which has been growing too clerical and conservativ. The rising was subdued.

A WRITER from France says that "the further we advance the more evident it becomes that the peace of the world no longer depends on any one will; it is at the mercy of an incident in the Balkans or in Constantinople."

BERLIN Socialists are endeavoring to establish a theater to be devoted to Socialistic and Atheistic plays. They also propose to hold a series of meetings to induce people to withdraw from all religious organizations.

IN a speech at New York on the 13th Powderly exhorted to opposition of Depew's poli ical aspirations, in revenge for his railroad's abuse of Knights, and called him "a hungry, ever-feasting spouter."

IN Gratz, Germany, a shining light of the church named Grandigger is about to be tried for a catalog of crimes embracing wife murder, murder for robbery, incest, three assaults on women, and minor cases of theft and forgery.

THE bishop of Chartres, France, in obedience to the determination of his church to monopolize supernatural commerce, is taking severe measures to suppress the followers of Mathilde Marchat, who claims to hav had a vision of Christ.

BEFORE winter sets in Americans will be asked to send at least $5,000,000 to Ireland to help prevent the starvation of 300,000 persons as the result of failure of the potato crop. The people there, having sent all their money away to the pope, are left dependent.

ON the night of the 14th a woman knelt in a New York street and prayed to be forgiven for the murder of two little children that accompanied her, which she was about to commit. A policeman mastered her after much struggling, and she has been sent to the asylum.

CHRISTIAN prejudice makes it difficult for Hebrew families to obtain hotel lodging at summer resorts. The Bancroft House prints on its circulars: "We utter the sentiments of many Christians from the cities when we warn boarding-house keepers to beware how they entertain Jews."

IN those parts of Europe, and especially Russia, whence Christian bigotry has expelled the Jews, factories hav deteriorated greatly for want of the skill and means of that enterprising race, and farming has become less profitable from lack of middlemen to bring the produce into market.

ON the 14th in the circuit court of Vernon, Ala., Rev. Thos. Owen was convicted of disturbing public worship and using obscene language to ladies. While conducting a revival meeting he had denounced in the vilest terms a number of ladies attending who refused to accept his teachings and join his church.

As an instance of the treatment of Jews in Russia, at Bialystok Dr. Granoffsky saw a Jewish boy pluck a pear from one of the doctor's trees that overhung the road, and dragging him in branded the word "thief" on his face in three places with nitrate of silver, and burnt away part of the cartilage of his nose and otherwise disfigured him.

AT the opening of the New York public schools on the 8th 15,000 applicants for admission were turned away for want of room. Last year 12,841 were turned away, but the authorities hav notwithstanding increased the seating capacity only 3,317. While this negligence, which has been annually repeated for a long time, looks bad from some points of view, it has the advantages of affording more time to the politicians to attend to their private interests, and of adding to the attendance at the parochial schools.

REV. SYLVAN FLOOK (to Rev. Pownsend Powndes, the noted evangelist): "Did you hav a successful revival at Quohosh?" Rev. Pownsend Powndes: "Very! I received four hundred and fifty dollars for three weeks' work."

PARSON BLUETT: "Brother Richard will please take up the collection." Deadwood Dick (the converted road-agent, reaching for his hip-pocket): "Throw up yer hands, gents! Er—hold on—I mean, be liberal, brethren, for the good cause!"

FIRST deacon: "The minister preached a fiery sermon against novel-reading last Sunday. I tell you it must hav had an effect upon the young ladies of the congregation who read fiction." Second deacon: "Is that so? From where did he take his text?" First deacon: "Oh, from one of the New Testament parables, I believe."

RUSTICATOR: "When I was discussing Science and Revelation with the Rev. Mr. Small to-day, he got excited and informed me he was descended from a race of New England clergymen who had always stood out against the arrogant claims of science. Were any of his people noted divines?" Old resident: "His grandfather was. He blew out the gas."

LATTER-DAY LYRICS.

I Puritani.

Devoutly devout, and austerely austere,
Was Hew-Them-In-Pieces Sellew.
A Puritan he, with a capital P,
Of seventeen hundred and two.

Of taking a shot at a Quaker on sight
He made a particular boast;
While, given a witch and a barrel of pitch,
He'd manage an excellent roast.

Could such a one, think you, hav fallen from grace?
Then list to this narrativ true.
A maiden one day did the heart steal away
Of Hew-Them-In-Pieces Sellew.

A stranger was she both to one and to all,
But wondrously, wondrously fair,
She gave but one look, but it brought him to book,
And plunged him in utter despair.

His sad-colored garments he speedily doffed,
Did Hew-Them-In-Pieces Sellew,
For gewgaw and gaud, which he couldn't afford,
Although they improved him to view.

His former amusements forthwith he eschewed,
No longer the Quaker did quake,
The witches were merry, and singular, very,
Not one of them went to the stake.

The scandal grew larger; 'twas even averred
By people who certainly knew,
That out on the green there could nightly be seen
A-dancing, good Master Sellew.

The twain to the solemn assembly were haled,
The trial gave infinit sport,
As one might expect from so plainly select
And rigidly orthodox court—

As, All-The-Day-Roaring Pigwhistleton Pratt,
And Strike-The-Loud-Psaltery Snell,
With Cherubim Cutts, and with Behemoth Butts,
And Howl-Ye-Oh-Kadesh Bedell.

Grim Behemoth Butts was for boiling in oil,
And Cutts recommended the knout,
While death on the wheel, all the rest seemed to feel,
Was nothing too much to giv out.

Then to his right mind was good Master Sellew
Restored, quite uninjured and whole,
But he couldn't forget a snare had been set
For his infinitesimal soul

By Diabolus, the father of mischief, himself.
It was a distinction as such,
But when he insisted on not being listed
For taxes, 'twas something too much.

With arrogance swollen beyond all belief
He calmly the bailiffs defied,
And yet what to do with presumptuous Sellew
The court couldn't really decide.

Until, to their infinit joy and relief,
'Twas quite unexpectedly shown,
The horrible schism of Arianism
Had counted him one of its own.

With arrows, and bullets, and missils diverse,
They bored him most thoroughly through,
And so in his pride, most uncomfortably died,
Stern Hew-Them-In-Pieces Sellew.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S "Children's Corner," MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, has been elected senior member of the School Board of Fall River, Mass.

The Truth Seeker Gives all the News of Freethought, and is Always on Guard Against the Encroachments of Ecclesiastics upon the People's Liberties.

If you have any Ideas or Reforms calculated to benefit humanity write to THE TRUTH SEEKER (sending your subscription) and let the world know of them. THE TRUTH SEEKER publishes each week more letters from the people than any other paper in the world.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is devoted to the defense of Mental Liberty, of American Institutions, and the Preservation of the United States Constitution, so far as regards religious tests, and the maintenance of human rights. It advocates the abolition of all laws based on religion or religious observances. It demands the taxation of church property. It is uncompromisingly opposed to anything tending toward a union of church and state, either in name or in fact.

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indescretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT.

"Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address,

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second, that he fulfills all his agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would hav been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

In Hanover a Baptist minister has been sentenced to imprisonment for one week because he immersed a young girl in ice-cold water and thus caused her sickness and death.

The poor unfortunate in Elizabeth who killed himself because he could not discover the principle of perpetual motion gave up too easily. Had he ever studied the mechanism of the Hon. Henry W. Blair's lower jaw? queries the Sun.

At a Socialist meeting held in Berlin Tuesday night Herr Vogtherr, one of the municipal officers, demanded that the Socialists secede from the national church. During the discussion a mention of Christ caused great disorder. The meeting was forcibly dispersed by the police.

Mr. Henry Irving, who recently pleaded the cause of the South London Fine Art Gallery, has received from a friend the promis of a donation of £1,000, in recognition of the gallery being the only one in London permanently open on Sundays. Trustees of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, in New York, will please take notice.

This is from the Catholic Union and Times: "What has become of The Truth Seeker's artist? Verily, the blasphemous little sheet is growing dull without those sublime illustrations of the genius of 'Free Thought.'" If Mr. Pat Cronin, who is described by Father Dent as a very amiable gentleman—especially when traveling—will examin the first and last pages of this issue of The Truth Seeker he will find the answer to his query.

The Catholic News says: "So far as union of church and state is concerned, it certainly requires no little assurance to raise the question when the commissioner of Indian affairs is a Protestant minister; his secretary the wife of a Protestant; the superintendent of Indian schools a Protestant minister; his secretary the wife of a Protestant minister; every member of the board of Indian commissioners a Protestant; and the whole action of the bureau shaped by Protestant missionary societies. More complete union of church and state never existed."

Is the New York Sun an Anarchist journal? It says: "The Hon. James G. Blaine, at the time when the commotion of the Missouri Pacific strike of 1886 had scarcely subsided, laid down a remarkably concise form of the fundamental law by which all labor unions and their demonstrations must be regulated. It was: 'One man's right ends where another man's right begins.' While that principle is observed strikes represent a right at the very root of liberty." When Messrs. Pentecost and Tucker preach like this they are called Anarchists and disturbers of society.

Cuba is infested with bandits; the most famous of them signs his proclamations: "I the king of the country people, and of nearly the whole island of Cuba, Manuel Garcia the First." His followers are good Christians, and think that they ward off capture by repeating this prayer: "O Lord! when my enemies [the gendarmes] will pursue me, let not their feet be useful for running; neither their hands take hold of me, nor their eyes see me. Throw them down as thou hast thrown those who wanted to arrest thee on holy Thursday. Deliver me from them as thou hast delivered Jonah from the whale's breast." Equally sacrilegious invocations, says the Christian Advocate, hav been uttered by Protestants in some cases in church feuds and times of great partisan excitement.

"Rambler," in the Canadian Advance, a Christian journal, referring to Dr. Talmage's recent lecture at Grimsby Park, Ont., says: "An immense and sympathetic audience of thousands greeted him. To say that the great mass went home dissatisfied would be to put it mildly. He talked just one hundred minutes and for this received $500, or $5 per minute, and what was given in exchange for this money? Stories that are as old as Methusaleh; hoary-headed old 'chestnuts' that hav done service in a thousand forms, from time immemorial. He managed to spend about five minutes in telling the thread-bare tale of a man so mean that he utilized a wart on the back of his neck as a collar button. This five-minute story netted Dr. Talmage $25. Another of his stock stories was of the man who invited an old friend home to dinner and who notified his wife through the telephone of the fact that Jones would dine with them. In the mean time Jones took his turn at the telephone and heard the indignant housewife cry, 'What are you bringing that old fool home to dinner for?' This story, by the watch, cost about $30."

The Living Church, of Chicago, says: "The country has been greatly agitated over the Louisiana lottery business; and well it may be. It is a shameful affair, a disgrace not only to that fair state, but to our whole land. It is not, however, our present purpose to say more about it. But we do call attention to that which in this connection has not been so much as mentioned. The secular papers are eloquent over the immorality of people in Louisiana, but they cannot be ignorant of the lottery business carried on in the full glare of open day in almost every Roman Catholic parish in the land. In our opinion it is more demoralizing than the Louisiana lottery, because it is conducted by a great and powerful church. Are lotteries wrong, immoral? If they are, then the Roman church is, in this respect, an immoral agency." On the same subject the New York Independent observes: "We would like in a kindly way to call the attention of our Catholic brethren to the fact that gambling is carried on at their fairs to a vastly greater extent than at corresponding Protestant entertainments whose purpose is to make money. Here is a clipping from one of the daily papers in reference to a picnic of a certain St. Peter's parish, where four thousand were in attendance: 'There was great interest in the various contests for prizes. Father Manly's blooded horse was drawn by ticket No. 1,680. Over two thousand tickets were sold at $1 each on the horse.' And yet the oldest pastoral letter that has come down to us, written in the Latin language by a bishop of Rome, was devoted to the sin of gambling."

God knew from the beginning that Eve would eat the apple, and then he knew that the devil would get old Eve, and there was one job spoiled that he had pronounced "very good." Then he knew that every child born before the birth of Christ would fall into the hands of old Clootie.

> They saw the fruit with wanton eyes,
> The serpent said 'twould make them wise,
> They plucked, they ate, and strange to tell,
> An apple doomed mankind to hell.

God knew when the devil entered the garden, and knew his business, and knew "the devil would be to pay." He knew that his plans would be thwarted, and that he did not slap the devil in the face shows that he thought him the better man and dare not knock the chip off his shoulder. It is easy to see that God's design in this matter did not turn out as he expected, for that which he pronounced very good turned out very bad.

Christians claim that God "knew from the beginning" exactly when and where and how every event would turn out, even to the most trivial detail. Then he knew that every child born before the birth of Christ would be damned, although many good and true men were born who sacrificed their lives for their country and their kind.

"With God all things are possible." He could just as well hav had the savior born the next day after the fall as hav waited four thousand years. This not only shows that he is unable to carry out his designs, but that he is not a first-class designer.

When these arguments are put to the Christian he looks wise, givs the rubber an extra squeeze, and says, "You are away off in your conclusions. For Moses and Aaron and Isaac and David and Solomon and many more of God's pets are twanging harps and wearing crowns, and if these could be saved other good men could be." Yes; and so could everybody else. And so the salvation scheme is run into the ground. The crucifixion was not only a failure but a wanton cruelty.

God designed that the gospel should be preached to every creature. Christians hav been trying to carry out this design nearly two thousand years, and hav succeeded in reaching only about one-fourth of the creatures. God created the "heavens and the earth and all the hosts of them" in six days, and his work was approved. But I am afraid that old age will overtake him, and that bald spot will come on top, and he will be crippling round on crutches, before Christians will be able to fully carry out his design at the rate they are working.

Christians will say that God did not design to hav Guiteau kill Garfield. They say it was the devil working through Guiteau. Was God pleased with the murder of Garfield? If he were possessed of infinit knowledge he knew it would occur; and having supreme power, if he did not prevent it he must hav been pleased with the transaction.

It beats all how God's designs change as man becomes more civilized. In the early history of New England the chief concern of the people was to carry out the design of God. They went upon the supposition that God had no power to do anything without their help. And the more they carried out the designs of God the worse it proved for the people.

The devil was then a thousand times more activ and powerful than he is to-day. When Christians are governed less by superstition, and pay more attention to the laws of heredity, and train the minds of the young to investigate the laws of nature, there will be less time spent in carrying out the designs of God, and the devil will be retired without a pension. If we could put a scientific thinker in the place of every skulking preacher and a work on science in the place of every Bible, men would outgrow such superstitions and take their places in the ranks of rational beings.

See how this idea of God's designs will make a man lose his reason and lap up superstitious slabber like a dog. To show the designs of God the Rev. Mr. Morris fashions the rubber in this wise: "See how admirably the roots of a tree are contrived to take hold of the ground and chain it there through all the tempests of the year."

Yes, here is a display of divine skill and design. Here is adaptation of means to ends which nothing but almighty power could accomplish.

But how about the top of the tree?

Is this, too, fashioned to withstand the shock of the tempest? While the roots are designed to hold the tree to the ground, the top seems to be designed so as to hav it torn up by the tornado.

What would be thought of a man's design who should ballast a ship, and then giv her spread of sail enough to capsize her the first breeze that sprung up?

God fashioned the roots of trees so that the wind could not blow them over. Then he arranged the top so that the wind could blow them over. Then he sent a wind that did blow them over. And so by this ingenious arrangement of the roots and the tops of trees, and by regulating the wind, this calculating God has managed to cover whole leagues of earth with prostrate trees.

Such a skilful designer ought to be rewarded, and I would be in favor of tendering him a vote of thanks.

> A tree by the roots he chains to the sod,
> And fashions the top so it falls at his nod;
> Hurrah for the great rubber double-geared God!

Yes, double-geared, that is what is meant. He can cause the roots of a tree to strike down into the earth until it is impossible for the tree to blow down. Then, by gaging the force of the wind and by the construction of the top he makes it impossible for the tree to stand. With God all things are possible, therefore he can make two impossibilities possible.

Talmage says he believes certain passages of the Bible because he cannot understand them. Such a man will take to Christianity as naturally as a redskin does to firewater.

Nobody but a Christian can see how God can move in two opposit directions at the same time, and no one else can harmonize two designs diametrically opposed to each other.

See how Rev. Mr. Morris, the great thimblerigger, can manipulate the little joker, and "tear the heart out of Infidelity" by playing the game of "Now you see it and now you don't see it." First, he goes on to show what skill and design God has shown in the construction of certain animals to take their prey. The tooth, claw, padded foot, suppleness of body, and general make-up of the tiger are cited to show how admirably God has adapted this animal to secure its prey.

"In the spider we discover designs so wise, contrivances so happy, and adaptations so successful as plainly to prove that the blessed creator has taught each the lesson of life's duties." And again, "Contrivance and design are clearly indicated in aquatic fowls. They can as readily dive and chase their prey along the bottoms of lakes and pools as they can skim through the atmosphere." And then the cunning of the fox is referred to, and the peculiar structure of the ear to catch the faintest sound to enable it to keep out of harm's way. And also its keen scent to enable it to find its prey when it cannot be seen. And then the hawk that swoops down upon its prey with a velocity even greater than that of a falling body of equal weight.

Such arguments satisfy the Christian mind, and it must be admitted that it would look tolerably fair were it not for the double gear and back-action of the design machinery. The design argument is like the Irishman's gun—it shoots both ways—and often the safer position is at the muzzle. While God has so constructed certain animals that they can entrap their prey, and made their lives depend upon their success, he has so fashioned others that they can escape.

"Put your finger toward a fly and it is off whenever you move up to a certain distance. God has given the fly this instinct so that it can escape the spider."

The fish and other animals upon which aquatic fowls prey are so constructed that they cannot be caught. The eye is so prominent that they can see in almost any direction, and thus are enabled to elude the approach of the enemy. The chicken will hide at the appearance of the hawk. "What but direct knowledge from God can inform the chicken that the hawk is its natural enemy?"

It requires a peculiar squeeze of the rubber to be shaped to the condition of the fox and many other animals. The fox is an animal of prey and is itself preyed upon. It livs upon birds and rats and chickens and other small game, and it often makes a dainty meal for the panther. And then the hound is never quite as happy as when his close proximity makes it uncomfortable. But how the design argument can be construed so as to favor the hound and the panther, and at the same time the fox and the game upon which it preys, nobody but a Christian can see.

"We discover," says the Rev. Herbert Morris, "other animals practicing strategems to elude and escape their enemies, which all the reason and cunning of man cannot excel." This argument also, when taken by itself, looks well.

But these different and adverse arguments drive us to the conclusion that God has formed some animals so that they can take their prey every time without mistake, and that he has fashioned the animals upon which they prey so that they can escape every time.

Will the Christian ever be able to see how these arguments utterly neutralize and annihilate each other?

It reminds me of the story about the two snakes who swallowed each other. The first day they had each other by the tail, the next, they had swallowed each other about half down, the third day they had disappeared. They had swallowed each other.

God is not only a great designer, but he is a benevolent designer. Nothing can take place contrary to God's will, but you will notice that the Christian never makes a very conspicuous display of his great designer in the time of a great calamity. If God sends the rain and the dew and the sunshine, he also sends the simoon, the tornado, and the earthquake.

The author of "Science and the Bible" says, "If we fully understood all the ends accomplished in the economy of nature we should see that God is good." And again he says, "His mercy is over all his works."

Every Christian would be shocked if one should intimate that his God was not merciful, wise, and good. This he has been taught and this is settled in his mind without thought or investigation.

Was God good and merciful when he caused an earthquake to swallow up thirty thousand people in South America? Was it a merciful act to send the marble pier at Lisbon with all its precious freight of human beings six hundred feet below the surface of the sea? Was it a token of God's mercy and goodness to bury the cities of Pompeii and Herculaneum by the belching of a volcano? Is it an act of mercy to inundate a territory and destroy millions of dollars' worth of property and thousands of lives?

God is the creator of all things, and he pronounced everything which he had created "very good." If all that he created was good, then the creator must be good. If God was possessed of all knowledge, then every act of the creator must hav been the wisest that infinit wisdom could devise. Every Christian will indorse each one of these conclusions. Let us see where they lead us. And I would hav the reader keep each one of these propositions distinctly in mind.

Herbert Morris says, "Previous to the advent of the son of righteousness, the great enemy of man, Satan, had disturbed all the moral elements of the world."

Now, if God created all things, where did the devil come from? If God did not create the devil, there must hav been another creator. If God did create the devil, he must be "very good." If, somehow, the devil slipped into existence without the knowledge of God, he is not infinit in wisdom. If the devil is equal with God in power, then God is not supreme. If he is not equal with God, why does he suffer him to exist?

According to the Christian's idea God did not create the devil, there was an angel that turned to a devil. But could this happen without God's knowledge? and had he not the power to prevent it? Was it a mark of God's goodness to allow the devil to come into existence in any way, when he knew that Old Splitfoot would worry and torment him and thwart half his plans, and drag two-thirds of the human family down to a country so hot that the boiling point would be the zero mark in a thermometer graduated for that region?

Then, to show his wisdom, and to get out of the scrape, the consequences of which he must hav foreseen, he begot himself on the person of a Jew girl, and then killed himself to abate the intensity of his own wrath, and neutralize the power of a being which he himself had created.

The part of God born of the virgin was called Christ—a sort of helpmate for God. And yet Christ was God and God was Christ. Each half was equal to the whole and the whole only equal to the half. Christ and God are one and yet when Christ was killed God still lived. Both are fighting the devil and hav power over him, and yet he is more than a match for the two. Such is the wisdom and power and goodness of God. Skin the poor; wheedle the last cent out of every boy and girl; send missionaries to the heathen—every skin of them will be lost who dies without a knowledge of this holy hotchpotch nonsense.

"God is merciful, God is wise, God is good." So says the great Herbert Morris; so says every Christian.

Tornadoes, earthquakes, volcanoes, drouths, floods, scorpions, centipedes, tarantulas, rattlesnakes, tigers, wolves, panthers, fleas, gnats, musketoes, potato-bugs, noxious and poisonous weeds and plants, and thousands of useless and harmful things which afflict and torment us and often produce disease and death and hav never been a benefit to anyone, according to the Christian idea must in some mysterious way be construed so as to show the mercy, wisdom, and goodness of God. This is what the Christian professes to believe, but every act of his life givs the lie to his profession.

The truth is that mankind through all time by common consent hav agreed that noxious and poisonous weeds and poisonous insects and reptils and ferocious beasts are only a curse to man, and hav waged a war of extermination against them as far as it has been in their power to do so. And to say that there is some unseen good in them, which we in our shortsightedness do not understand, shows that the Christian religion has the power to rob men of their manhood and make them profess to believe what they know to be false, and so keep up an endless contradiction between practice and profession, and to turn men into sneaks and cowards.

Christianity—in the Beginning.

ITS PAGAN ORIGIN.

As it [nature] was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end, amen.—Prayer Book.

In considering the problem of the origin and development of Christianity it is necessary to approach the subject in a calm and philosophical manner, and setting aside all preconceived ideas carefully examin all the evidence accessible on the subject, and endeavor to ascertain the causes which led up to the origin and contributed, in all its varied stages, to the growth of the religion called Christianity.

And first it will be acknowledged that before any correct judgment can be arrived at concerning the truth or falsehood of any system, we must learn something about that which immediately preceded it, and out of which it probably grew. We must see what each system has in common; ascertain their points of difference, and learn how much originality there is in the later system, and finally, by critical analysis, determin its value. Now, there can be little doubt that the two most ancient creeds in the world, and to which we must look as the source of all great religions, were nature worship and sun worship. Our early ancestors, there is every reason to believe, first worshiped nature, and when ultimately the idea of gods or spirits behind nature arose they attributed the varied and multifarious phenomena of the universe to certain concrete beings which they, in their ignorance, imagined to possess qualities far transcending their own. When, however, they came to the opinion that the spirits within such objects as wood or stone or living beings like serpents did not rule and govern the universe, they transferred their worship to the sun—the source of light and heat, and the generator of all forms of life.

In sun worship we get the very highest ideal of nature worship, for after all it is the generativ force that is worshiped—the power by which all forms of life are brought into being, and the warmth by which they are sustained. Nature worship being the germ and sun worship the developed plant, it is not surprising to any student of ancient oriental religions to find that they all possess a great deal in common; that Christian symbols and ceremonies point unmistakably to the old source—in other words, to the parent tree or source from which all eastern religions hav descended.

Not only do we find a family likeness characterizing all Eastern creeds, but we find similar symbols reappearing in all of them, such as the cross, the trinity, and the virgin mother and her child.

Further, we can trace similar ceremonies and sacraments, which play an important part in all Eastern religions. But let us consider the origin of such symbols as we hav just mentioned.

The cross, which is regarded with reverence by most religious persons to day, and a small one of which is worn round the necks of modern pious spinsters, owes its origin to the worship of the generativ organs, being, in fact, emblematical of the phallus pertaining to the god of the sky.

The straight pole represents the connecting link between heaven and earth, and the beams that project from it further symbolize the conformation of the male deity. And just here the reader should understand that our early ancestors saw nothing indecent in anything that was natural. For the most part they went about in a nude condition, or, at best, but very scantily attired; they wandered about through deserts under the scorching rays of the sun; through forests, over hills, and through valleys, and they never experienced any sense of shame at beholding the human form, either male or female, in all its naked purity.

"Gross injustice is sometimes done to ancient creeds," says Mrs. Besant in "The Freethinker's Text-Book," part II, page 356, "by contemplating them from a modern point of view; in those days every part of nature was thought divine, and most divine of all was deemed the power of creation, whether worshiped in the sun whose beams impregnated the earth, or in the male or female organs of generation, the universal creators of life in the animal world; thus we find in all ancient sculptures carvings of the phallus and the yoni expressed both naturally and symbolically, the representations becoming more and more conventional and refined as civilization advanced; of the infinit world it may be said that it was 'naked and was not ashamed;' as it grew older and clothed the human form, it also draped its religious symbols, but as the body remains unaltered under its garments, so the idea concealed beneath the emblems remains the same."

The union of male and female is then the foundation of all religions. For as man marries the woman, so Saturn, the sky, and the male or activ energy, is allegorically joined to Rhea, the earth, the receptiv or female principle, or mother of all.

In Persia the sun was worshiped under the name of Jupiter, who was regarded as the son of Saturn, the god of time, who was also the father of Pluto, the prince of darkness, and manager of the lower regions.

In this way the sun becomes the father of all and is the emblem which crowns the images of deity in the churches. The vernal equinox represents the resurrection of the sun and the sign in which he then is becomes the symbol of life-producing power; thus the bull, and afterward the ram, became his sign of life-giver, and the sun god was pictured as bull, or as ram (or lamb), or else with the horns of his emblem, and the earthly animals became sacred for his sake. Mithra, the sun god of Persia, is sculptured as riding on a bull; Osiris, the sun god of Egypt, wears the horns of the bull, and is worshiped as Osiris-Apis, or Serapis the sun god, in the sign of Apis, the bull. Later, by the precession of the equinoxes, the sun of the vernal equinox has passed into the sign of the ram (called in Persia the lamb), and we find Jupiter Ammon, Jupiter with rams' horns, and Jesus, the lamb of God.

These symbols all denote the sun victorious over darkness and death, giving life to the world.

The phallus is the other great symbol of the life-giver, generating life in the woman as the sun in the earth. Bacchus, Adonis, Dionysius, Apollo, Hercules, Hermes, Thummez, Jupiter, Jehovah, Jao, or Jah, Moloch, Baal, Asher, with many another, these are all the life giver under different names; they are the sun, the creator, the phallus. Red is their appropriate color. When the sun or the phallus is not drawn in its natural form it is indicated by a symbol; the symbol must be upright, hard or else burning, either conical or clubbed at one end. Thus the torch, flame of fire, cone, serpent, thyrsus, triangle, letter T, cross, crosier, scepter, caduceus, knobbed stick, tall tree, upright stone, spire, tower, minaret, upright pole, arrow, spear, sword, club, upright stump, etc., are all symbols of the generativ force of the male energy in nature of the supreme God" (Annie Besant's Freethinker's Text-Book, part II, p. 357).

Thus far we see that the fundamental principle underlying the Christian faith is to be found in paganism, and that the true source of all Eastern creeds is to be traced back to nature and sun worship in all its manifold forms.

The Philosopher and the Pagan.

Philosopher:

The fires belonging to the Christian hell
Are growing small; hell's flaming citadel
Is tumbling; and our preachers rarely yell
About the wicked Beelzebub, or dwell
On gnashing teeth and wailings, or the smell
Of brimstone—a stone discerned in hell.

Pagan: They are magnanimous!

Philosopher:

John Calvin did teach that for Jesus's sake
The Jews, popes, pagans, and infants would make Their beds in hell. But since reason can shake
Hell's foundation, many divines forsake
That creed—except as to the Jews, who take John Calvin's beds, and that for Jesus's sake.

Pagan: That's ungenerous. Jesus forgave the Jews.

Philosopher:

For killing him, yes—
But not for the apple that Adam ate.

Pagan: An apple? Does Jesus make a fuss about an apple?

Philosopher:

That's right, hence hear no creed in Jesus's name
Or you'll be damned. They tell us that he came
On earth to save from death and sin and shame,
And be a God. Whoever doubts this same
Must go below as Satan's lawful game
And suffer all hell-fire—in Jesus's name.

Pagan: The merciful and tender Jesus! Is doubting then a crime?

Philosopher:

If you be wise you'll never hear the plan
Which saves the cut-throat, thief, and charlatan,
But lights hell fire for any honest man
That seeks the way to truth as best he can.
Great Buddha's teachings are much better than
This scheme which Christians call "the plan."

Pagan: Buddha's? Yes, they are marvelous. And that you call the plan is—ah! I can say nothing more.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

Freethought is booming in France. No less than one hundred and thirty societies hav been added to the Federation since last January, and they all agree in being Freethinkers in deed and not in words only; hence we anticipate great results from the national congress which will be held in Paris on Sunday, October 12th.

A German-American Freethinker. Mr. Robert Liebe, of Boston, Mass., died August 17th in Heidelberg. He and Mrs. Robert Liebe were on a pleasure trip to Germany. After the secular obsequies his remains were cremated. Mr. Liebe was an outspoken and open-handed Freethinker, and all who knew him will long keep his memory green.

Mr. Paul Steinmar, president of the Free Religious Society in Rixdorf, Germany, has been discharged by the second state court, to which he appealed after a judgment of three months' imprisonment had been pronounced on him by the city court. One meteor, at least, in the dark night of orthodox intolerance that prevails in Germany at present.—Freireligiöses-Sonntags Blatt.

At the request of the executiv committee of Swedish Freethinkers, the writer hereby expresses the hearty thanks of our Swedish brethren to the American Freethinkers for the help rendered them during the past, and especially to the editor and publisher of the Boston Investigator, Messrs. Washburn and Mendum, as well as to the Editor of this journal, Mr. E M. Macdonald, for the favorable reports of the Freethought movement in Sweden which hav appeared and do yet appear in their respectiv papers.

In Sweden Mr. Henry V. Berghell has by the Jönköping city court been sentenced to three months' imprisonment for blasphemy. It is, however, to be hoped that not alone Göta Hofrätt but likewise the supreme court will overrule the judgment. They hav certainly received lessons enough of late. But then there is the pious king Oscar, and he is not to be depended on; his opinion, which is the decisiv one, is in charge of the clergy. The sentence did not disturb Mr. Berghell, judging from the fact that upon his arrival at Stockholm he delivered the same lecture and the authorities did not interfere. Funny justice they hav there in Sweden.

Our French contemporary La Vérite, edited by Mr C. Cilwa, secretary of the Federation of French Freethought societies, has in its last number the first of a series of biographies, by the editor, of Freethinkers who hav devoted themselvs to the cause of humanity. The biographical sketch given is that of the French writer, Dr. Albert Regnard, who was born in Nèvre, March 20, 1836. He studied medicin and took an activ part in the school movements during the last days of the empire. In 1865 he published a volume, "Historical Essays and Scientific Critiques," in which he advocated radical Freethought and Atheism. After the congress at Liège (November, 1865) he was expelled from the university and hospitals. During the Commune he occupied the position of secretary to the prefect of police, and was on the establishment of the republic obliged to flee to London, where he remained for ten years, publishing several works, until the amnesty was issued by the republican government. He then returned, and divided his time between editing La Révolution and publishing several original works, among them "Histoire de l'Angleterre Contemporaine." He has likewise translated into French Professor Büchner's book, "Force and Matter." As honorary member of the French Freethought Association he has taken a conspicuous part in the congresses held at Anvers and Paris.

France being officially a Catholic country, it is naturally cursed with several remnants of an ecclesiastic past in the form of holy days. Of course it would be ridiculous for a Freethinker to participate in such superstitious mummeries, hence our brethren in the administrativ council hav decided to hav some more sensible feasts take the place of the old ones The feasts are as follow: January 1st, Festival of Universal Brotherhood; February 24th, Festival of Universal Suffrage, of Labor and Industry; March 18th, Festival in Honor of the Martyrs for Liberty. The Festival of the Fathers is to succeed the Catholic feast of Ascension; the Pentecost will hav to retreat for the Festival of Flowers and Youth; and God's feasts must abdicate in favor of the Festival of Science. July 14th will be a French "Fourth of July;" August 15th (Assumption) is to become the Festival of Maternity; the Day of the Dead, the Festival in Honor of the Departed; and lastly Christmas is to giv place to a Children's Festival. The Freethought societies hav been urged to celebrate these festivals and to report the result, and the program, to the executiv committee. We think this an excellent plan, well worthy imitation. We hav not many "holy" days, but we could perform quite a service to our descendants by inaugurating a revision of the rather antiquated and nonsensical way in which we keep our national days.

Fourteenth Annual Congress.

The Fourteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union has been appointed by the board of directors to meet at Portsmouth, O., on Friday evening, October 31, 1890, and to continue its sessions on the Saturday and Sunday following.

The meetings will be held in the Grand Opera House, corner of Sixth and Court streets, and the orchestra of the establishment has been engaged for the occasion. Due notice will be given of the proposed reduction in railroad, steamboat, and hotel fares.

Portsmouth is situated on the Ohio river, one hundred miles east of Cincinnati, and one hundred miles south of Columbus, and has extensiv and convenient railway connections with the whole country. It is a port of foreign entry, and is distinguished for its numerous and magnificent manufactories. It has a population exceeding fifteen thousand, has twenty churches, the Ohio Military Academy, and a splendid system of graded schools. The Ohio valley fair is held there annually; and several English and German papers, daily and weekly, are published in the city.

The members and friends of the American Secular Union are sure of a hearty welcome, not only from our enterprising local auxiliary, but also from the citizens at large.

The object of the American Secular Union, as is well known, is to secure the total separation of church and state in fact and in form, to the end that equal rights in religion, genuin morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood be established, protected, and perpetuated. While we unite on what is commonly known as the Nine Demands of Secularism, we propose to emphasize the following at the coming Congress:

1. The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.

2. The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.

3. The repeal and prevention of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons.

4. The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character.

The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both religion and politics, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but heartily welcomes all persons, of whatever faith, to its membership, on the basis of "no union of church and state." The word "secular" is here used in the broadest sense, as applied to the state, and not to any system of religion or philosophy.

To discuss these questions in an orderly and friendly manner, and to devise ways and means to promote these objects, let us come together at this Congress as Freethinkers, Spiritualists, Unitarians, Universalists, Free Religionists, Quakers, progressiv Jews, and liberal Christians, and, laying aside our peculiar views on religious questions, unite as American citizens on the one broad platform of no union of church and state, and the complete administration of our secular government on purely secular principles.

The National Reform Association, having for its object the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the state by constitutional enactment; the American Sabbath Union, working for the enforcement, by legislation, of the Jewish and puritanic Sabbath on our free citizens; the Women's Christian Temperance Union, indorsing the platform and policy of both these organizations; the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, insisting through their ecclesiastical bodies upon the complete exemption of church property from just taxation, as well as the appropriation of public money for religious schools and other sectarian institutions; all these, and many others which might be mentioned, are imperiling our constitutional liberties. Every true Liberal and patriot, whether man or woman, should feel called upon to aid in organizing an effectiv opposition to these nefarious schemes.

Due notice will be given of the selection of eminent speakers from all portions of the United States and Canada, and a free platform will be given to all persons who may hav a word to say for pure state secularization. All, without exception, are welcome to this Congress in the wide-awake little city in the valley of the beautiful Ohio.

Special Notice.

At the Congress of the American Secular Union, to be held at Portsmouth, O., Oct. 31, Nov. 1, and Nov. 2, 1890, the following amendments to the constitution will be proposed:

1. Strike out the word "constitution" wherever it occurs (as applied to this society) and insert "by-laws." Also make any other verbal alterations necessary to hav the instrument conform to any charter of incorporation that may be offered and accepted by the Union.

2 Amend Art. IX, by adding the following: "He or she shall deliver lectures in behalf of the Union as occasion may require and other duties may permit, and shall also solicit annual and life members, and subscriptions to the funds of the association."

Campaigning in Washington.

Blaine, Whatcom county, is a thriving little city in embryo, admirably located on the extreme northwest corner of the state, adjoining her Britannic majesty's domain. Its residents are giving evidence of energy, pluck, and progress. They are laying out and grading broad, handsome streets, and erecting stately business marts and beautiful, cosy homes.

Blaine possesses many advantages—a most salubrious climate, beautiful scenery, picturesque location, and a backing by the richest of agricultural lands, with abundance of giant timber and inexhaustible supplies of coal and iron in the vicinity; so that, independent of its insured prosperity from the now dense woods becoming fruitful farms, the timber, coal, and iron will prompt investment of capital and the establishment of foundries, machine shops, and manufactories, thus insuring steady employment to large numbers of skilled wage-workers, who will build homes and thus increase the city limits and value of town lots. It is providing steady employment for wage-workers that insures the permanent growth and prosperity of a town, not speculativ booms and flaming advertisments of real estate fiends.

The Fairhaven and Southern railroad, recently purchased by the Great Northwestern, is now being pushed to completion with great activity. The laying of the track to Blaine will be completed by November 1st, and it will be the most northern port on Puget sound reached by one of the great transcontinental systems.

The drawback to Blaine is lack of good fresh water. Artesian wells are expected to supply this need.

Mr. Paul Smith, the eloquent and able exponent of Spiritualism, prepared the way for me at Blaine by delivering a course of lectures that aroused interest and started the spirit of investigation, among the more intelligent Christians, as to the divine inspiration of the scriptures. However much we may differ in regard to the claims of force and energy vs. Spiritual phenomena, we should ever be mindful of the lasting obligations we are under for the grand good work done, and continually being done, by our Spiritualist friends in dissipating the awe and reverence for the "holy Bible" that in so many minds prove an almost inseparable barrier to investigation, or even discussion of its claims to divine authority. While justly claiming that "Truth is that which in the face of all possible opposition can be shown to be in conformity with fact and sound reason," yet as Liberals we should cheerfully accord to all others the same right to accept or reject any testimony that we claim for ourselvs. While denouncing the bigotry of Christians and deploring their lack of charity toward those who differ from them, we should be very careful lest we betray the same spirit toward our coworkers because in some points they differ from us. Paul Smith, like James Buchanan and the other Spiritualists of Blaine, are of the right royal kind. They are Liberals first, last, and all the time; yet not the less Spiritualists, zealous defenders of their faith, founded on what to them is satisfactory evidence of the existence of life after death. Certain it is that, until the mysterious phenomena are to them satisfactorily accounted for, they are justified, and should be commended, for having the courage of their convictions.

The new Opera House has a seating capacity for six hundred. It has a parquet, and two galleries, with a good stage.

Although not yet completed, it was crowded, even in the two unfinished galleries, at each of the three lectures.

I gave the usual invitation for questions, but no minister responded. The Methodist minister after the lecture came upon the stage and cordially invited me to call on him at his parsonage, which I did. He attended the two first lectures and expressed his regret that he could not attend the third night, as that was his church's regular prayer meeting night. He was evidently sincere, and a naturally good, kind-hearted man, and I so testified at my third lecture. I hav since learned that my indorsement of him, and his openly avowed approval of the principles of Liberalism in so far as making a heaven for ourselvs here and now by promoting the happiness of all around us, has so exasperated the devoutly pious that he has been compelled to resign.

In my account of receipts for the defense fund of the Washington Secular Union, the contribution of that stanch old veteran in the cause of Liberalism, J. S. Martin, of Snohomish, $3, was omitted; also $1 from loyal and true G. P. Brene, of Canon City, Col.

C. B. REYNOLDS,

To the Liberals of Oregon.

DEAR FRIENDS: I wish to call your attention to the second annual Congress of the Oregon state Secular Union, to be held in Portland at the New Arion Hall, corner of Second and Oak streets, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, the 11th, 12th, and 13th of October next.

The object of this meeting, and of the Oregon state Secular Union, is to guarantee civil and religious liberty to the people, secure the taxation of church property, and oppose the union of church and state.

We want this meeting to be a grand success, and we ask every Liberal in the state to coöperate with us and aid us in making it so. Will you come forward, one and all, and "lend a helping hand?" Announce the Congress through your local papers; circulate cards of invitation; post up notices at your post-office and country stores, in fact, do all you can to let everyone know of this great, important meeting, that all may attend if they so desire. Write to President Beal and let him know what you are doing toward aiding the Congress; let words of cheer resound from every city, town, and village in the state. We most cordially invite every Liberal, every person who is in favor of the total separation of church and state, to be present. The speakers who are to be present will be the best that hav yet been together.

Rents are as high as they were last year, and it will cost quite a sum to pay the expenses of the Congress. We need financial aid. Let every Liberal who is willing and able to do so forward a few dollars to help defray the expenses. All financial aid will be most thankfully received. Send all money to Pres. C. Beal, Portland, Ore., and he will giv credit for it in Freethought. Do not wait until it is too late, for now is the time we need encouragement. We can make our Congress a success if we only try. If everyone will help, even a little, our meeting will be all that we desire.

We hav lately had some neat blanks printed petitioning the legislature of Oregon for the taxation of church property, and we would be pleased to place copies of this petition in the hands of every earnest Liberal worker in the state for circulation. The exemption of ecclesiastical property from just taxation is a gross injustice to the people. It is unconstitutional and not in keeping with the general principle of our government, and all laws favoring this unjust exemption should be immediately repealed.

We also hav had copies printed of the constitution of the Oregon state Secular Union, and we ask you, Liberal friends, to send for them and circulate them throughout the state, and secure as many signatures for membership as possible. There is no membership fee. All that is required is the name and post-office address of those who are in sympathy with the objects of the Union and wish to become members. We would like to hav the name of every Liberal-minded person in the state recorded on our membership book. We already hav a large number of names.

Now, Liberals, one and all, if you think you can secure any signatures for the petition, or for the constitution of our Union, by presenting them to your friends and neighbors in your locality, please send for them at once, and they will be promptly forwarded to you. Blank petitions and copies of the constitution, and also cards of invitation, are to be obtained from either President Beal or myself.

With best wishes for the success of our Congress, and sincerely hoping that as many as possible will attend our grand meeting, and join with us in helping to promote liberty, truth, justice, and equality, I am, Ever yours faithfully,

ELVA DAVIDSON BLACKBURN,
Assist. Sec. Ore. State Secular Union.
Oswego, Ore., Sept. 15, ERA OF SCIENCE 290.

The Canadian Secular Union Congress.

The annual convention of the Canadian Secular Union was held on Saturday and Sunday, September 13th and 14th, in Science Hall, 35 Adelaide street east, Toronto. At a few minutes after 8, on Saturday night, as we learn by Secular Thought, Robt. C. Adams, of Montreal, the president, took the chair, and, after reading the announcement and program of the convention, proceeded to read his address. Some of the things he said were:

We hav to congratulate ourselvs that the government censorship has been defeated, and that a custom-house collector can no longer trample upon the immortal writings of Thomas Paine. We hav secured the incorporation of a company that will be able to publish and circulate Secular literature.

An oaths bill has been prepared for the Dominion Parliament and for the province of Quebec, which givs to every witness the option of oath or affirmation, and forbids all inquisition into religious opinion. This bill, if passed, will place Canada in the forefront of the nations as regards toleration, and we hav the satisfaction of knowing that the bill has received the approval of the honorable minister of justice and will be presented and supported at the next session of Parliament by so eminent and estimable a member as Sir Donald A. Smith. Progress at Quebec will be slower, but influential support is already promised, and the educational effect of the discussion of the topics involved will be valuable.

The Secularists of Toronto hav a special work before them in the redemption of their fair city from Sabbatarian tyranny. The museum, art gallery, and library must be opened to the workingman on his only day of leisure, and suitable recreation and instruction must be made available for him. The men who now uphold these restrictions while posing as friends of God, must be shown to be enemies of Good, and freedom from ecclesiastical tyranny and the bondage of ancient Hebrew customs must be secured. As the blood of Jesus loses its drawing power, the ministers of religion are looking to legal enactments to fill their churches, through the monopoly of Sunday. Secularists everywhere can do no better work for Liberalism than by setting the example of a sensible desecration of the Sabbath, and by the inculcation of intelligent opinions as to the right observance of the rest-day so as to best promote human welfare.

The president was freely applauded, and upon motion of Mr. Charles Watts, seconded by Mr. Duval, was given a vote of thanks. After the reports of the secretary and treasurer had been read, the former, Mr. Ellis, read letters and telegrams from friends who were not able to be present. Colonel Ingersoll sent this telegram:

I congratulate the Secularists of Canada on the growth and spread of their principles; on the increasing civilization and intellectual hospitality of the people everywhere; on the decay of creeds that even revision can't save. I also congratulate them on the fact that there is published in their midst Secular Thought, one of the very best journals in the world. I sincerely regret that I cannot be with you.

R. G. INGERSOLL.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER sent this, it is unnecessary to say, by mail:

NEW YORK, Sept. 9, 1890.

MY DEAR MR. WATTS: I wish I could attend your Canadian Convention, but I cannot. I hope, however, that you will not, because of this, refuse to come to our Secular Union Congress, to be held next month.

I hope your convention will be attended by every Freethinker in Canada. I hav watched the progress of the Dominion toward Secularism, and can see that each year it takes a step ahead. This I think is largely due to your splendid journal, Secular Thought, and to your convincing lectures; and a good share of the remaining credit is due to your gentle but vigorous president, Robert C. Adams, under whose guidance your Union compelled the government to admit Thomas Paine's writings to a country where they are surely needed. I hope the Union will push the Oaths bill, so that your courts will not longer be disgraced by superstitious ceremonies, nor justice be denied to men who refuse to lose their manhood by submitting to the mummery of superstition.

From the standpoint of an outsider, I should say that, religiously, the Dominion is about twenty-five years ahead of its position some four years ago, when you located there, and I congratulate you. Even the Roman Catholics of Quebec are growing in Secular grace, and will soon be "on praying ground and pleading terms," as the Methodists—of whom you hav too many with you—are wont to say. A friend of mine who was born n ar the city of Quebec, and who was educated for the priesthood, but left the church to become an inventor and a business man—a true type of a Secularist—revisited his boyhood's home recently, and when he returned to New York he told me this story. In the parish where liv his relativs the people hav begun to criticise their priest, and to question whether all his acts are of infinit wisdom. Among other things they wanted to know recently was, what became of all their money. The tithes which the law givs him he could hav, they said; but he was constantly demanding more, and the expenditure of this surplus it was their right to examin. So they elected two of the boldest of the questioners to the board of trustees, which is supposed to supervise the financial affairs of the church. These embryo heretics asked for the account books, and were refused. "The trustees," said the priest, "hav always accepted my statements, and so must you." The trustees instituted law proceedings. Th n the priest preached a sermon on "ingratitude," and violently denounced the two meddlers. They gave him the alternativ of retracting or standing a libel suit. He retracted. Then he called upon them and told them that unless they ceased their "persecution" he would call down upon them the wrath of God, and hinted at anathemas and curses and excommunication. At this the trustees actually laughed, and told him that he was some years behind the times; that God was not now the servant of the priests, neither was the priest the dispenser of heaven's displeasure. The priest appealed to the bishop, and the bishop wrote little pastoral letters to his recalcitrant children. But the trustees persisted, finally obtained the books, found that the priest had used the parish funds to build stables for his horses and for other private purposes, and made him refund.

This happened in the year of the Lord 1890, in French Canada, near Quebec! What will happen in the next century, when Upper and Lower Canada may be sovereign states in the American Union?

Secularism, Rationalism, is the coming philosophy of the world, and the coming power. The next war will be between education and ignorance—reason and superstition. In this war the Secularists and Freethinkers must bear a noble part. In the words of the greatest and best of men, you are laying the foundations of the grand temple of the future—not the temple of all the gods, but of all the people—wherein, with appropriate rites, will be celebrated the religion of humanity. You are doing what little you can to hasten the coming of the day when society shall cease producing millionaires and mendicants—gorged indolence and famished industry—truth in rags and superstition robed and crowned.

With such aims your work cannot be a failure. In the coming years, the people now meeting in your convention will be looked upon as the redeemers of their country. If I cannot be with you, let me at least be of you.

E. M. MACDONALD.

Letters were received from Saladin of the Agnostic Journal, G. W. Foote of the Freethinker, and G. J. Holyoake, of England; W. Algie, James Lockie, G A. Kilpatrick, M. Brooks, John Groon, and W. G. Hay, of Canada. The president said that perhaps more good would come from the letters of the absentees than from the speeches of those present. The letters contained some noble and inspiring sentiments, which would be quoted by the press over the whole world, and would become watchwords for them in the future. This undoubtedly referred to the letters from England, and Editor Macdonald's quotation from Ingersoll. After the appointment of committees the convention adjourned to Sunday morning.

When 10 A.M. Sunday arrived, the convention was also there, and re-elected Robert C. Adams president; Mr. Risser, secretary; Mr. Earsman, treasurer. Mr. Watts submitted the three following resolutions, which were carried unanimously:

1. Resolved, While it is a source of regret that Mr. Charles Bradlaugh has been compelled to withdraw from the leadership of the Secular party in England, the Secularists and Freethinkers of Canada send their warmest congratulations to his successor, Mr. G. W. Foote, and wish him every success as president of the National Secular Society.

2. Resolved, The members of the Canadian Secular Union assembled in convention desire to express their heartiest sympathy with the American Secular Union in its efforts to destroy superstition and to establish mental liberty and personal freedom from all ecclesiastical despotism.

3. Resolved, That this convention unanimously record their earnest hope that Col. Robert G. Ingersoll will visit Canada during the coming year and giv one or more lectures in Toronto and Montreal.

A fourth resolution was as follows:

4. Resolved, The delegates and friends here assembled express their great pleasure at the progress that Secularism has hitherto made throughout the Dominion; and particularly urge upon all friends of Liberal thought in Canada to do their utmost in the future to further extend a knowledge and the practice of the principles of the Toronto Secular society.

During the consideration of this resolution, Mr. Moffatt started an interesting discussion on the oaths question. He thought there was not enough attention paid to this practical aspect of Secularism, and drew attention to a case where a man in the country had been attacked and severely injured, but who, upon the case coming on for trial, had not been allowed to giv his evidence on account of being a Secularist, and had thus been denied any chance of getting redress. Mr. Moffatt had written to their member of Parliament, but had had no reply, and thought the Union should make this a special point for work during the next year. Mr. Morris mentioned a case in which he had been allowed to giv his evidence in a civil action under affirmation. Mr. Middleton explained that this law only applied to civil, not to criminal cases. The president said, under the Ontario statutes, the judge had the option of admitting evidence in civil cases if he thought the interests of justice demanded it, but it should not be left to the judge to decide such a question. No inquiry into the religious belief of witnesses should be allowed. Capt. Simpson mentioned a case in which, on the trial of a suit in which he was the plaintiff, the judge had decided to admit his evidence. Mr. Duval emphasized the importance of writing to members of Parliament and calling their attention to the absurdity of the present law. The resolution was then unanimously carried.

A fifth resolution read:

5. Resolved, Inasmuch as humanity is higher than nationality, the Secularists and Freethinkers of Canada send their warmest greetings to their Secular brothers and sisters in every land; believing in the philosophy of the noble sentiments of Thomas Paine, "The world is my country, to do good my religion."

Other resolutions relating to local work in Canada were also passed, and next summer the Union will hav open-air speaking as a result. Considerable time was also spent in considering the best way to aid Secularism by papers, tracts, libraries, buildings, etc. Mr. Ellis added that he thought Secularists as a body should take an activ part in the discussion of the great and fundamental questions which were now agitating the masses on both sides of the Atlantic. It was becoming a question of Individualism against some system of Socialism; and while he regarded the former as an impracticable attempt to carry the crude principles of Natural Selection into the national life, the latter he looked upon as the legitimate outcome of that humanitarianism which was at the basis of all civilization, and which seeks in coöperation for the general good the attainment of the highest possible individual good and happiness. He also thought that Secularism should be something besides "mere Freethought"—for instance, science and philosophy.

Sunday evening was the closing session of the congress, and those who were fortunate enough to secure either seats or standing-room at the evening session (and a large number arrived only to find the hall crowded) enjoyed an exceptionally good program. The music provided by Mr. Monk was of a most recherché character (so the reporter charges), and was loudly applauded; and Mrs. Watts's recitation (delivered as it was with all her accustomed histrionic ability and charm of manner) was rapturously received, as it well deserved to be. Mr. Charles Watts presided.

Captain Adams then proceeded to deliver the lecture for which he had been announced. His subject was, "Hav Faith in Man," and the following is a brief summary: The character and culture of all persons are indicated by the motivs that impel them to act. All effort is based on the assurance of success, and two classes of motivs giv rise to this assurance—the supernatural and the natural. These may be termed faith in God and faith in man, trust in divine interposition and trust in human effort, belief in prayer and belief in works. The intellectual status of the man and the civilization of the race or nation are in accord with the degree of supernatural belief, so that the rationalistic man is the most intelligent and the skeptical nation is the most civilized. The more God the less knowledge, and the more knowledge the less God.

Faith in God has proved a failure. It has not secured the advance of knowledge. It was when man invented printing, in the fifteenth century, that, as Taine says, "men first opened their eyes and saw." It has failed to preserve from danger. Seven thousand earthquakes hav destroyed thirteen million lives, and countless shipwrecks hav overwhelmed myriads of praying men. When we travel, our trust is in the pilot, the shipbuilder, and the mechanic, in the locomotiv engineer and the switchman, in man's knowledge and effort. The popular estimate of the value of supernatural aid was shown by the old lady who, when told in a storm that there was no hope but trust in God, despairingly exclaimed, "Oh, Lord, has it come to that?" From man's study of natural forces and not from direct "revelation," has come all sanitation, invention, discovery, political freedom, and economic prosperity. It is Rationalism that in all advancing lands has secured liberty and reform, and it is man's knowledge of and conquest over natural forces upon which all progress depends. Kingcraft and priestcraft must giv place to handicraft.

Mr. Watts then made a few concluding remarks of congratulation and encouragement, which were enthusiastically received by the audience; and half an hour or so was spent in pleasant conversation, and regretful leave-takings brought the convention of 1890 to a close.

Lectures and Meetings.

MR. H. O PENTECOST has resumed his Sunday meetings. He speaks on Sundays at 11 o'clock A.M., in Newark, N. J., at Liberal League Hall, Halsey street, near Market; at 3:30 P.M., in Brooklyn, at Everett Assembly Rooms, Bridge street, corner of Willoughby; and at 8 o'clock P.M., in New York, at Grand Opera House Hall, entrance on Twenty-third street, near Eighth avenue.

FOR a few weeks the Liberals of the East hav an opportunity of hearing a new Freethought lecturer if they so desire. Miss Ada Campbell, of Australia, is sojourning with us, and is willing to take the platform. Miss Campbell is one of the pioneers of Liberalism in Australia and New Zealand—a brilliant, bustling woman who penetrated new territory and carried the gospel of freedom into the mountains and cities of Australasia. The press of that extra continent speak highly of her ability. The Press, New Zealand, says of one of her efforts: "The stage at the Theater Royal was occupied last night by Miss Ada Campbell, an Australian Freethought lecturess, who is announced to deliver a series of Sunday evening discourses here, her subject for last evening being 'Sunday in the Light of Reason, Its Use and Abuse.'. Miss Campbell is a fluent and forcible speaker, of prepossessing appearance, and considerable dramatic power, and has at command a fund of incident and anecdote, both grave and gay, with which she very judiciously seasons her address, and thus irresistibly interests her hearers. The audience last night was a fairly large one, and the lecturess received more than the ordinary share of applause allotted to entertainers, or perhaps, as she would rather be styled, enlighteners, of her description, while she certainly caused genuin amusement by her vivacious and witty sallies." Miss Campbell may be addressed in care of Dr. Elliott, 160 West 14th street, New York city.

A Catholic Defends His Church.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: On several occasions I hav loaned my TRUTH SEEKER to a Catholic, who keeps a bookstore. He said he would like to reply to Peck's article with regard to Catholics, owing their first allegiance to the church. Inclosed please find his reply.

Very respectfully, W. J. LOOKE.

THE REPLY.

A friend handed me a copy of your paper. It is distressing to think there are so many who misunderstand, or are so ignorant of, the teachings of the Catholic church. The idea that I cannot be a loyal citizen of this republic and a true Catholic at the same time, is to me ridiculous, and I am sure no one who has read the history of America's struggle for independence will ever make such a charge. General Washington warned Americans to never forget the noble part that Catholics took in the struggle for independence. I always feel proud to think of the muster roll of that grand little army, for there I find thousands of Catholic names, Irish Catholic names, not to speak of the legions of France who took part in the glorious cause. Look at the Tory ranks. You find no Catholics there. Then again in 1812, and in every war for the preservation of our government, I find my people in great numbers. Four sons of my father marched under the stars and stripes to the tune of "Rally Around the Flag," and I hav a good right to know the feeling of my people. Irish American Catholics, priests and laymen, are as true to the principles of a republican government as any class in the republic dare be. We can march out against any force that would dare to invade this country for the purpose of subjugating it, or of destroying our Constitution that guarantees us freedom and religious liberty. The blood of Ireland flows in the veins of thirty millions of the American people.

Irishmen hav had a fearful experience with kingly and queenly rule, and the person who would try to set up such a rule in America would not wear his crown twenty-four hours. In all things spiritual we humbly bow to the teaching of the Catholic church. With the pope as supreme judge, we can say, with the great O'Connell, "We will take our religion from Rome; our politics are our own." There never was anything taught amongst my forefathers but the Christian doctrin. The religious practices of my parents strengthened my love for the doctrin of Christ. I hav studied and practiced it from my youth. I find it the religion of pure love—love for my neighbor, no matter whether he be Turk, Jew, or Infidel. I may abhor their ideas, but must pity and love them for Jesus's sake. I found the sacraments, confession and communion, to giv me strength against the passions that poor humanity is heir to, in order to lead a pure, holy life, a "loving, spiritual life." Catholics must go often to confession and communion. Confession is not a matter of form. In order that our sins be forgiven, we must hav a hearty sorrow for our sins; we must hav a firm purpose of amendment, or else our confessions are bad, and it would be far better not to make them at all; in fact, such confessions make people worse, and bring great calamities on themselvs and their families. The true Catholic, when he goes on his knees and confesses to the priest, "the visible representativ of Christ," though he tells his sins to the priest, and the priest givs him absolution, that absolution is of no avail unless the penitent felt that he was confessing to almighty God, telling the whole truth, and making a firm promis never to commit such sins again. This, you see, does away with the charge often made against Catholics, viz., "that they can commit any crime, and all they hav to do is to go to the priest, giv him some money, and he forgivs them all their sins." Ridiculous.

I tell you, if I owned the state of Texas, and I was to giv it to a priest on condition that he forgiv me a certain sin, it would avail me nothing unless I was heartily sorry, and if I wronged my neighbor I would hav to make reparation.

Now, about the public school question. All the schooling I ever got was a few years in the public schools. I never found anything objectionable in the old Sander's readers. And if Protestants would stop poking false history and matters calculated to excite prejudice into school-books, we would not hav so much excitement on this question. But no father wants his child to learn lies One day my boy had to get a history. When I came home he said, "Pa, I hav Parley's Universal History." I was almost struck dumb. I had read so much about Parley's vile stuff and to think that here it was put into the hands of my boy as truth—it aroused all the bitter feelings of my nature, for I wished my boy to be brought up loving and being loved in return by his schoolmates, but here was put into his hands an instrument that would cause him to despise the practices of all that his forefathers held dear. Here was a book that would cause his schoolmates to despise him and his parents. I certainly went quickly to this teacher and forbade her to teach my boy from that false book. I certainly went to the man who sold my boy that book and made him return the money. Then do you wonder that Catholics cry against public schools?

Again, I learned enough about the public schools to know that there are books, pictures, and conversation carried on there calculated to fill the mind with impurity, and let me tell you that the first thought of Catholic parents is to raise their children pure and undefiled. A pure mind helps to make a healthy body, a healthy body begets a healthy offspring—one of the great causes of the rapid increase of Catholics in America. I tell you that if there had been a sufficient number of priests to watch and administer the sacraments and preach in the right tongue to all the Catholics who come to America, we would to-day hav in the United States 30 000 000 in place of 10 000 000. I hav traveled eight years amongst Southern people, selling Catholic literature. I found them noble, hospitable people. They came to Texas from all parts of the South. Three-fourths of them are derived from old Irish stock; they are blood of my blood, and though they bear such names as O'Neal, O'Dougherty, McMahon, and hundreds of old Catholic names, they know nothing true of the religion of their fathers, so that millions are lost to the church. We shall at the last day hav to account to God of our stewardship. Where is the shepherd or shepherds to whom the loss of those millions are charged? I could in my poor way write you for hours, for days, of the beauties of the Christian doctrin, the religion of love. Though you publish horrible ideas in your paper I do not hate you. I will pray for you that the sacred heart of Jesus may giv you grace to see the truth. The friend who sends you this can, if he likes, tell you that I am only a poor layman. I hav a horror of the non-belief in Jesus Christ, a horror of the teachings of your journal, for I find so much in it that is not true. I want you to publish all of this, or none. Praying that Christ may giv you the true light,

Sincerely, CHAS. BOYLE.

San Antonio, July 7, 1890.

SOME FACTS ON THE SUBJECT.

Hon. John Jay in the Independent.

The national incident occurring at Washington so soon after the centennial celebration and the inauguration of a Roman university, to teach the canon law in all its antagonism to the Constitution and the common law, naturally recalls and emphasizes the bold experiment which seems to hav been accomplished without demur, of inducing the president to lend to the inauguration the official sanction of his presence, by professions of loyalty; and then of placing him at the banquet, not in the seat of honor to which the executiv of the republic is accustomed and entitled, but in a second place, as subordinate to a Roman Canadian cardinal. The act presented prominently to the American people, although owing to the regrettable reserve of the press it is neither known nor appreciated by all Americans, the prominent antagonistic features of the Latin and American civilizations, one of which is thus announced with singular clearness by the Civilta Cattolica, whose papal authority is beyond question:

> The [Roman] church is empowered to amend and to cancel the civil laws or the sentences proceeding from a secular court whenever they may be in collision with the spiritual weal; and she has the faculty to check the abuse of the executiv and of the armed forces, or even to prescribe their employment whenever the requirements for the protection of the Christian faith may require it. . . . Therefore, the civil ruler of a Christian people must be in subordination to the Christian priesthood and especially to the Roman pontiff.

THE RULER OF THE PRIESTS.

The Rev. James McGolarick, Roman Catholic Bishop of Duluth.

"The lips of the priest shall keep knowledge and they shall seek the law at his mouth." The priest is the guardian of the sacraments, and if there be for his flock any proximate danger of sin, they are bound to warn them and prevent, if possible, the danger. But it must be remembered that the priest is a member of a living church, and that he cannot, according to his whims and fancies, make laws; his business is to act according to the laws made by the church, and interpret and condemn as she interprets and condemns.

THE RIGHTFUL EMPEROR.

Bull of Pope Gregory VII.

He (the pope) alone has the right to assume empire. All nations must kiss his feet.

WHAT THE PRESENT POPE THINKS ON THE SUBJECT.

Encyclical of Leo XIII. of Jan. 10, 1889.

If the laws of the state are openly at variance with the law of God—if they inflict injury upon the church—if they clash with the dictates of religion, or set at naught the authority of Jesus Christ which is invested in the supreme pontiff, then, indeed, it becomes a duty to resist them, a sin to render obedience. . . . Nay, it is a duty assigned by God to the church to make resistance, if at any time the state does harm to religion, and to strive that the virtue of the gospel shall influence the laws and institutions of peoples. . . . There is no true and lawful authority except that which comes from God, the sovereign Lord of all, who alone has power to giv man authority over his fellow-man. . . . Now, to declare what is the divine teaching is the function of the teaching church to whom God has intrusted the guardianship and interpretation of his words. But the highest teacher in the church is the Roman pontiff. Hence, as the union of mind necessitates a perfect agreement in one faith, so it calls all wills to be perfectly submissiv and obedient to the church and the Roman pontiff as to God. . . . The diminution and loss of Christian faith is shown most of all in the wrongs which are too often done to the Catholic religion publicly and before the eyes of men—wrongs which an age that practiced religion would not suffer for a moment.

Still Quibbling.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: My strictures on your criticism of Lyman C. Howe I marked ad libitum, and did not really expect to see the letter printed. But what I write now I do expect you to print.

"Quibbles" is your polite editorial heading. Let us see who is the quibbler.

You now charge Mr. Howe with having had sittings with Mr. Reid for slate-writing prior to November, 1889, "which," you say, "were in every case total failures, as he now tells us."

It does not appear from the quotation you made from Mr. Howe in November, 1889, that prior to that time he had any sittings for slate-writing with the medium Reid. But writing in August, 1890, Mr. Howe says: "I hav had sittings with Walter E. Reid for independent slate-writing. In every case it was a total failure."

You now admit that you unintentionally garbled a quotation from the medium Reid, and mistakenly attributed it to Mr. Howe; but you insist that "the inadvertent substitution of the words 'were all' for 'are' in no wise changes the matter." That depends on whether you are right in your present allegation, that Mr. Howe's sittings for slate-writing were before November, 1889.

My criticism was based on the record produced by yourself, and I leave it to the reader whether there was any quibble on my part.

If I had found in the "One Hundred and Forty-four Propositions Proved Affirmativly and Negativly from Scripture, Without Comment," as bad a blunder as yours concerning Mr. Howe's alleged self-contradiction, I would hav felt mortified.

In regard to your other blunder in comparing a private note of mine (which was itself an editorial indiscretion) with a public letter of Miss Wixon, I appeal to the record in THE TRUTH SEEKER for my vindication, and I cannot believe that even Miss Wixon herself will say that the statement you quoted from my private letter was inaccurate.

Many years ago there was a tilt between the editor of the Tribune and a schoolmaster. The latter was accused of using bad grammar. He, in turn, gave Mr. Dana, the managing editor, a countercharge. To this Mr. Dana replied personally saying that he was not the editor of the Tribune; and he added, "It is another person than me."

There was grammar for you. And yet I consider Mr. Dana the ablest editor in the country.

Moral: It is better to teach by example than by precept. BURR.

A PARABLE.—There was a man once standing on the banks of the Mississippi river, and in one of the numerous eddies he saw a straw floating up stream; and he went straightway throughout the world proclaiming that the Mississippi river had changed its course and ran north from the Gulf of Mexico nigh up to the British possessions. But the world heeded him not. It knew better.—ED. T. S.

New England From 1620 to 1789.

This was the period when the so-called "blue laws" were most rigorously enforced, not only in Connecticut, with which tradition associates them, but in Massachusetts. In the former colony no food or lodging could be given to a Quaker, Adamite, or other heretic. No one could run on the Sabbath day or walk in his garden or elsewhere, except reverently to and from meeting. No one could travel, cook victuals, make beds, sweep house, cut hair, or shave on the Sabbath day. No woman could kiss her child on Sabbath or fasting day. Whoever brought cards into the colony paid a fine of £5. No one could read the Book of Common Prayer, keep Christmas or Saints' Days, make minced pies, dance, play cards, or play on any instrument of music, except the trumpet, drum, and jewsharp. Liquor drinking was regulated, and the use of tobacco was tinkered incessantly. No one under twenty-one years, nor anyone not previously accustomed to it, could take tobacco without a physician's certificate. No one could take it publicly in the streets or in the fields or woods, except on a journey of at least ten miles. Nor could anyone take it in any house in his town with more than one other person taking it at the same time. (This last injunction was leveled at the so-called "tobacco parliaments.") About 1645 the Massachusetts magistrates were greatly troubled that the people would tell lies. The general court had already prohibited gaming, and now added bowling and the shuffle-board to other prohibited amusements. Plymouth Colony prosecuted for mixed dancing, and Massachusetts forbade it in ordinaries at weddings. In 1650 domestic manners needed refining in the colonies as well as in the mother country. The Massachusetts general court forbade husbands to strike wives; neither was the helpmate to lift her hand against the would-be master of her person. Still more anxious and assiduous were the efforts to regulate dress, which in the view of colonial magistrates was meant not only to cover and protect people, but to classify them. But the sober costume in which New England men and women were ordered to appear constantly tended to break out in extravagance of texture, form, or color. The doublet was common to both sexes. Gentlemen wore it over a sleeved waistcoat, something like our jacket. The sleeves were often slashed and embroidered, though such ornamentation was forbidden by statute. Falling bands at the neck were very common, and sometimes they were embroidered. A deep linen collar sometimes served in place of the bands. Trunk hose were worn and long stockings, with shoes tied or ornamented with rosets. A beaver or felt hat covered the head. Embroidered gloves were almost essential to handsome dress; gentlemen wore gauntlets, the wrist flaps richly figured or fringed. Swords were often suspended from elaborate shoulder belts. In spite of reiterated legal prohibitions, gold and silver lace was often seen. But the great majority dressed plainly. Any one of less estate than two hundred pounds was held to a strict account in the matter of clothes. The women under this rank offended especially by wearing silk and tiffany hoods; they also wore broad-brimmed hats. Under the pointed stomacher and gown the women wore a petticoat either of woolen stuff or of rich silk or brocade, according to their station. The ruff had lately given place to a broad collar, plain or embroidered, falling over the shoulders. Leather clothing was much worn, by laborers especially. The tanned deerskin, which the Indians taught the colonists to prepare, served well for garments. Hampshire kerseys were used for common wear. Monmouth caps and red Kent capes are mentioned among the articles used by the lower classes. A mandilion, or over jacket, was fastened with hooks and eyes. Their shoes had wooden heels. The so called Irish stockings of the period were, apparently, not knit, but made of cloth. Bright hues were not approved of in any social class. When merchants ordered cloth from their London correspondents they were careful to specify "sad-colored stuffs."

Peccadilloes occupied a large part of the time of selectmen and county courts. In 1649 Reading fined three married women five shillings each for scolding. This was a common offense, according to judicial records. One Matthew Stanley was fined £5 for winning the affections of John Tarbox's daughter without her parents' consent. Connecticut, in 1636 would not allow any young unmarried man to keep house, but Windsor in 1652 permitted Isaac Shelden and Samuel Rockwell to keep house together, "so they carried themselvs soberly and did not entertain idle persons by day or night." Husking often gave rise to a degree of festivness that worried the magistrates. In Long Island, where the customs were very like those of New England, one James Chichester, at a corn husking in 1661, found a red ear and said that he must kiss "Bette" Scudder. The damsel replied that she would "whip his brick." These endearments ended in a scuffle, whereat Goody Scudder interposed. The result was a summons before the town court and a fine of twelve shillings, with costs, for James, who probably eschewed red ears thereafter.

Colonel Ingersoll on Sunday Observance.

A Recent Interview in the Morning Journal.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll reclined in his swivel chair yesterday afternoon looking comfortably cool in spite of the torrid weather, when a Journal reporter called at his Wall street office.

His cherubic face beamed with the milk of human kindness as he extended his hand in greeting, saying:

"Now, Mr. Journal, if you hav not turned census enumerator and want to know all about my anatomy, I am ready to talk to you."

He settled himself for a chat, while the reporter assured him that all he wanted to know was his views on the workingmen's Sabbath and how it should be kept.

"All right," said the colonel, genially, with a comical sigh of relief, "go ahead."

Thus invited the reporter asked:

"What do you think of the sacredness of the Sabbath?"

Colonel Ingersoll replied in his impressiv manner:

"I think all days, all times, and all seasons are alike sacred. I think the best day in a man's life is the day that he was truly the happiest. Every day in which good is done to humanity is a holy day.

"If I were to make a calendar of sacred days, I would put down the days in which the greatest inventions came to the mind of genius; the days when scattered tribes became nations; the days when good laws were passed; the days when bad ones were repealed; the days when kings were dethroned and the people given their own.

"In other words, every day in which good has been done; in which men and women hav truly fallen in love; days in which babes were born destined to change the civilization of the world. These are all sacred days. Days on which men hav fought for the right, suffered for the right, died for the right; all days in which there were heroic actions for good. The day when slavery was abolished in the United States is holier than any Sabbath by reason of 'divine consecration.'

"Of course, I care nothing about the sacredness of the Sabbath because it was hallowed in the Old Testament, or because on that day Jehovah is said to hav rested from his labors. A space of time can not be sacred, any more than a vacuum can be sacred, and it is rendered sacred by deeds done in it, and not in and of itself.

"If we should finally invent some means of traveling by which we could go a thousand miles a day, a man could escape Sunday all his life by traveling west. He could start Monday, and stay in Monday all the time. Or, if he should some time get near the North Pole, he could walk faster than the earth turns, and thus beat Sunday all the while."

"Should not the museums and art galleries be thrown open to the workingmen free on Sunday?" asked the Journal.

"Undoubtedly. In all civilized countries this is done, and I believe it would be done in New York, only it is said that money has been given on condition that the museums should be kept closed on Sunday. I hav also heard it said that large sums will be withheld by certain old people who hav the prospect of dying in the near future, if the museums are opened on Sunday.

"This, however, seems to me a very poor and shallow excuse. Money should not be received under such conditions. One of the curses of our country has been the giving of gifts to religious colleges on certain conditions. As, for instance, the money given to Andover by the original founder on the condition that a certain creed be taught, and other large amounts hav been given on a like condition. Now, the result of this is that the theological professor must teach what these donors hav indicated or go out of the institution; or—and this last 'or' is generally the trouble—teach what he does not believe, endeavoring to get around it by giving new meanings to old words.

"I think the cause of intellectual progress has been much delayed by these conditions put in the wills of supposed benefactors, so that after they are dead they can rule people who hav the habit of being alive. In my opinion a corpse is a poor ruler, and after a man is dead he should keep quiet.

"Of course all that he did will liv, and should be allowed to hav its natural effect. If he was a great inventor or discoverer, or if he uttered great truths, these became the property of the world; but he should not endeavor, after he is dead, to rule the living, by conditions attached to gifts.

"All the museums and libraries should be opened, not only to the workingmen, but to all others. If to see great paintings, great statues, wonderful works of art; if to read the thoughts of the greatest men—if these things tend to the civilization of the race, then they should be put as nearly as possible within the reach of all.

"The man who works eight or ten or twelve hours a day has no time during the six days of labor to visit libraries or museums. Sunday is his day of leisure, his day of recreation, and on that day he should hav the privilege, and he himself should deem it a right, to visit all the public libraries and museums, parks and gardens.

"In other words, I think the laboring man should hav the same rights on Sunday, to say the least of it, that wealthy people hav on other days. The man of wealth has leisure. He can attend these places on any day he may desire; but necessity being the master of the poor man, Sunday is his one day for such a purpose. For men of wealth to close the museums and libraries on that day shows that they hav either a mistaken idea as to the well-being of their fellow-men, or that they care nothing about the rights of any except the wealthy.

"Personally, I hav no sort of patience with the theological snivel and drivel about the sacredness of the Sabbath. I do not understand why they do not accept the words of their own Christ, namely, that 'the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath.'

"The hypocrits of Judea were great sticklers for the Sabbath, and the orthodox Christians of New York are exactly the same. My own opinion is that a man who has been at work all the week, in the dust and heat, can hardly afford to waste his Sunday in hearing an orthodox sermon—a sermon that gives him the cheerful intelligence that his chances for being damned are largely in the majority.

"I think it far better for the workingman to get acquainted with his family, to go out into the park, into the woods, up to some German garden, where he can hear the music of Wagner, or even the waltzes of Strauss, or to take a boat and go down to the shore of the sea. I think that in summer a few waves of the ocean are far more refreshing than all the orthodox sermons of the world.

"As a matter of fact, I believe the preachers leave the city in the summer and let the devil do his worst. Whether it is believed that the devil has less power in warm weather, I do not know. But I do know that, as the mercury rises, the anxiety about souls decreases, and the hotter New York becomes the cooler hell seems to be.

"I want the workingman, no matter what he works at—whether at doctoring people or trying lawsuits or running for office—to hav a real good time on Sunday. He, of course, must be careful not to interfere with the rights of others. He ought not to play draw poker on the steps of a church.

"Neither should he stone a Chinese funeral, nor go to any excesses; but all the week long he should hav it in his mind: 'Next Sunday I am going to hav a good time. My wife and I and the children are going to hav a happy time. I am going out with the girl I like.' Or, 'My young man is going to take me to the picnic.' And this thought, and this hope, of having a good time on Sunday—of seeing some great pictures up at the Metropolitan Art Gallery—together with a good many bad ones—will make work easy and lighten the burden on the shoulders of toil.

"I take a great interest, too, in the workingwomen—particularly in the working women. I think every working-man should see to it that every working-woman has a good time Sunday. I am no preacher. All I want is that everybody should enjoy himself in such a way that he will not, and does not, interfere with the enjoyment of others.

"It will not do to say that we cannot trust the people. Our government is based upon the idea that the people can be trusted, and those who say that the workingmen cannot be trusted do not believe in republican or democratic institutions.

"For one, I am perfectly willing to trust the working people of the country. I do, every day. I trust the engineers on the cars and steamers. I trust the builders of houses. I trust all laboring men every day of my life, and if the laboring people of the country were not trustworthy—if they were malicious or dishonest—life would not be worth living."

Thanking Mr. Ingersoll in the name of a million readers, the reporter departed from the smiling presence of the great advocate.

Helen and We Feel Bad But Thankful.

From Liberty, B. R. Tucker's Anarchist Organ.

The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is not a very acute or penetrating thinker. The subject of social reform he understands about as deeply as that other Liberal light, Helen Gardener. Here is what he says in a recent issue: "Mr. Dana, of the New York Sun, in a two-line editorial, lays down this rule for acquiring a worldly competence: 'One rule for getting rich is to mind your own business.' Mr. Pentecost of the Twentieth Century has found another method. He says: 'When poor people will no longer become policemen nor soldiers, then poor people will be free; and when poor people are free, they will be no longer poor.' If the Sun's rule is true, why are not all those who do mind their own business above want; and if Mr. Pentecost's words are true, why are not all who abstain from joining the army and the police force in the same condition? Is it possible that both philosophers are wrong?" No, both philosophers are right. If the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER understood their meaning, he would not regard the two statements as different, but would see that they both express the same idea. Those who do mind their own business are not above want simply because other people interfere with them and plunder and enslave them. If everybody determined to mind his own business, there would be no involuntary poverty in the world, and this is what Mr. Dana theoretically recommends, though practically he favors a thousand and one governmental villainies. Those who abstain from joining the army and police force are not above want, because those who do not so abstain are ready to enforce the restrictions and tyrannical demands of the meddlers and loafers who wish to liv at other people's expense. If nobody joined the army and police force, the pretended saviors of society could not enforce their wishes, and everybody would hav his due.

WHAT strikes us most in considering the medieval tortures, is not so much their diabolical barbarity, which it is indeed impossible to exaggerate, as the extraordinary variety, and what may be termed the artistic skill, they displayed. They represent a condition of thought in which men had pondered long and carefully on all the forms of suffering, had compared and combined the different kinds of torture, till they had become the most consummate masters of their art, had expended on the subject all the resources of the utmost ingenuity, and had pursued it with the ardor of a passion. . . . In every prison the crucifix and the rack stood side by side, and in almost every country the abolition of torture was at last effected by a movement which the church opposed, and by men whom she had cursed.—Lecky.

What They Say About The Picture Book

From San Francisco Freethought.

The Truth Seeker Company's "Pictorial Text-Book" comes pretty near being the greatest thing of the age. It contains about two hundred full-page pictures and the same number of pages of reading matter, making nearly four hundred pages in all, of the size of Freethought. The picture of Watson Heston as a frontispiece does questionable justice to the handsome Missourian, but is fine-looking, nevertheless. What adds doubly to the value of the illustrations is the text appearing opposit each and giving the picture fresh significance. The editor has drawn on something like two hundred authorities to justify the artist, and in so doing brings together a formidable collection of sentiment against the Christian church and its claim to being a divine and beneficent institution. The price of the book is two dollars, and it is worth five.

As several purchasers of the "Pictorial Text-Book" desired some blank leaves inserted therein to enable them to make annotations or record thoughts, a small part of the edition has been printed with such additions. Those who desire the book with these extra pages hav only to express the wish when ordering.

The Secular Union's Allies and Enemies.

By the reasoning of the God-in-the-Constitutionists, as set forth by their organ, the Christian Statesman, the American Secular Union has innumerable allies, the good faith of some of whom, however, we are disposed to question. But let the Statesman hav its say; its frank avowal of treason to American political principles will perhaps arouse some of our friends who are resting in security:

"For many years we hav published, from time to time, the 'Demands of Liberalism,' as formulated by Francis E Abbot, and held forth by the Liberal League as a declaration of its principles and aims. The Liberal League ceased to exist several years ago, but we hav used its famous 'demands' as a frank, explicit, and ringing statement of the ends toward which a portion of our citizens are steadily striving to carry the American people. These 'demands' having appeared again in one of our recent issues, we hav received a note from Miss Ida C. Craddock, corresponding secretary of the American Secular Union, calling attention to the fact that this society, which is the organized representativ to-day of the same principles and tendencies, has a somewhat different platform, and requesting us to publish it. This we very gladly do, for a chief end of the publication of the Christian Statesman is to inform the American people concerning this well-defined secular tendency in our government, and to arouse them to resist it. We recognize that the issue between us is more accurately defined by the new title, 'Secular Union,' than by the name, 'The Liberal League,' for the latter term implies an accusation—that Christianity is illiberal—which we deny. The word 'Secular,' on the other hand, describes a system which belongs to this world alone, without any reference to another world, or a divine spirit. (National Reform Manual, page 161.) This purely godless, or Atheistic state—we use the word Atheistic in no offensiv sense—is the system which the Secular Union is seeking to establish on American soil. How grave is the revolution which it seeks to effect can be judged from the platform, which we wish all American citizens would thoughtfully ponder. As the Union is soon to hold its annual meeting at Portsmouth, O., this publication of its principles will be found opportune. It is as follows:

"'PLATFORM OF THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

"'We advocate:—1. The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.

"'2. The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.

"'3. The repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution, rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons.

"'4. The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian order.

"'5. The abolition of ecclesiastical chaplaincies paid out of the public treasury.

"'6. The discontinuance of the practice of the appointment by the president of the United States and the governors of the several states of religious festivals and fasts.

"'7. The substitution of a solemn affirmation, under the pains and penalties of perjury, in the courts and in all other departments of the government, in place of the common form of a judicial oath.

"'8. The defense through the courts of any American citizen whose equal religious and political rights are denied, or who is oppressed on account of any opinions he may hav held or expressed on the subject of religion.

"'9. The promulgation by all peaceable and orderly means, of the great principles of religious liberty and equal rights, devotion to truth for its own sake, and universal brotherhood on the ground of a common humanity; and the protection of the state from encroachments of the church.'

"The strength of the Secular movement is not to be judged from the number of members in the Secular Union, or from the size of its conventions, any more than the strength of our national Christianity is to be judged from the numbers embraced in the National Reform Association. The American Sentinel represents a body of Christian people, the Seventh Day Adventists, who hav ardently espoused the Secular theory and are propagating it with extraordinary diligence. They hav also organized a society—the Religious Liberty Association. Many other Christian people, including many ministers of religion, are intelligent and thoroughgoing Secularists in their political beliefs. Multitudes are misled by the appeal to our written Constitution in its silence concerning God and the Christian religion. All who advocate a purely Secular education in our public schools range themselvs on the same side, for the school molds the nation and is intended to do so, and the objection which avails to rule the idea of God out of the school-house will avail to abolish chaplaincies and Thanksgiving proclamations, and eliminate every religious idea from our national life. All who seek to base our Sabbath laws and the Sabbath observing usages of our government on purely Secular or humanitarian considerations, without reference to the author of the Sabbath, are arguing to the same result. The issue joined in these discussions is simply this: Hav we as a nation any God to whom we pray and whose law we acknowledge? It is the gravest, deepest, farthest-reaching issue which has ever arisen in our history. The right answer to great practical questions which are pressing on the nation depends on the right settlement of this underlying issue, and the fact that these practical questions hav arisen and cannot be shoved aside indicates that the decision of this deeper question cannot be much longer postponed."

The Seventh Day Adventists, through the Sentinel, are good allies in working for some of our Demands. But their Religious Liberty Association holds the following principles:

"1. We believe in the religion taught by Jesus Christ.

"2. We believe in temperance, and regard the liquor traffic as a curse to society.

"3. We believe in supporting the civil government, and submitting to its authority.

"4. We deny the right of any civil government to legislate on religious questions.

"5. We believe it is the right, and should be the privilege, of every man to worship according to the dictates of his own conscience.

"6. We also believe it to be our duty to use every lawful and honorable means to prevent religious legislation by the civil government; that we and our fellow-citizens may enjoy the inestimable blessings of both religious and civil liberty."

The religion of Jesus Christ is the religion which actuates the people who persecute the Seventh Day Adventists, and they find their justification in the Bible, which makes God sovereign of the universe, and Jesus to be God, who commanded, "But those mine enemies, which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me." For our part, we cannot see why anybody should believe in a religion like that.

In the third "believe," the Adventists are a little hypocritical. They do not really believe in submitting to the authority of government, for they are constantly resisting its right to imprison them for refusing to observe Sunday. In this, they hav our hearty benediction and aid whenever such can be rendered.

The remainder of their "believes" are right enough, though they might broaden the fifth by inserting the words "or not worship." A very apparent difference between the Adventists and the Secularists, or Freethinkers, is that we are contending for others' rights as well as for our own.

Of our other allies, as defined by the Statesman, we hav grave suspicions. There may be some "Christian people, including many ministers of religion," who talk very fairly about our Demands, but there are very few who will do more than talk. They do not attend our conventions, read our journals, circulate petitions against Blair bills, giv money to send documents to legislatures, talk to legislativ committees, or do any of the work necessary in this fight for equal rights. The one or two brilliant exceptions we recollect were M. J. Savage and Dr. McGlynn at the Union's last congress, and even they tiptoed in, said their splendid says, and tiptoed out again, as though a little afraid of the company they were keeping. They were there, we thought, more from good will for the Union's president than because they felt hearty sympathy with the Union's work.

There are a good many, too, who advocate separation of church and state as a "glittering generality," but who look with complacency upon the employment of chaplains in the legislature; or, at least, we never heard them protest against it. They may hold our sentiments in a dilettant sort of way, but their coats are not off and sleeves rolled up for the work of propagating them. Abstractly and intellectually they are with us; but their influence goes for our opponents.

The National Reformers, however, are the logical folk. The Adventists, in clinging to the Christian religion and refusing to carry it into all parts of their life—political as well as social—fall short of being real Christians. But it is a fault much worthier of praise than the National Reformers' virtues. The National Reformers would, if they could, make us virtual slaves to the priesthood, for everywhere, in all religions, the word of God means the will of the men the people elect to explain that word. Happily, the tendency of the times is toward Secularistic principles, and if the country could only be aroused to action upon the subject there need be little fear of the result. But the fanatics will, ere this is accomplished, do a vast deal of damage, and for this reason every Freethinker with the courage of his convictions should attend the Secular Union Congress and help emphasize the protest against ecclesiastical encroachment upon our civil liberties. Let us hav a Congress the size of which will be some indication of the strength of purely Secular principles.

Idaho's Test Oath.

The Seventh Day Adventists and Baptists discern trouble ahead for themselvs in Idaho as a result of the test oath designed for the purpose of disfranchising Mormons. They find that the oath, when strictly adhered to, will disfranchise them as well. The part of the oath which voters must take, and objected to by them, reads:

"I do swear . . . that I do not and will not, publicly or privately, or in any manner whatever, teach, advise, counsel, or encourage any person to commit the crime of bigamy or polygamy, or any other crime defined by law, either as a religious duty or otherwise."

The Seventh Day people claim that this will reach them, inasmuch as Sabbath, or Sunday, breaking is usually defined by law as a crime; and that they teach, counsel, advise, and encourage Saturday-keeping, and therefore Sunday-breaking, as a religious duty. Alonzo T. Jones, one of their most vigorous writers, gives in the American Sentinel a forcible illustration of what they mean. "There is a strong demand being made on all legislativ bodies, from Congress to the legislature of Idaho, that laws shall be enacted compelling everybody to observe Sunday, and making it a crime to do any work on that day. Now, there are a considerable number of people in the United States, and there are some in Idaho—Seventh Day Adventists, and Seventh Day Baptists—who do not recognize Sunday as a day to be observed in any way different from any other working day. They work on that day. They teach that it is right to work on that day. Yet, if the state of Idaho should enact such a Sunday law, as is demanded by those who are working for Sunday laws everywhere, this test oath would disfranchise every Seventh Day Adventist and every Seventh Day Baptist in the state—not for anything that is wrong, nor for anything that injures a soul on earth, but simply because Sunday laws make a crime of honest work; and these people from honest conviction would work on Sunday, even though the law prohibited it. For nearly a year, Tennessee has been carrying on a series of persecutions of some of these people for committing such a heinous crime as plowing corn and hoeing potatoes on Sunday. Tennessee has no such test oath as Idaho. If she had, every Seventh Day Adventist, every Seventh Day Baptist, and every Jew who stood by his honest convictions would be disfranchised. Idaho has the test oath, but we believe has not as yet any such Sunday law. If Idaho should adopt such a Sunday law as Tennessee, or should Tennessee adopt such a test oath as Idaho, then it would soon be seen that such a test oath accomplishes a great deal more than was contemplated when that oath was made a part of the law. And it would be a great injustice too. To work on Sunday is not a crime, and never can properly be made a crime, and therefore to disfranchise whole peoples for Sunday labor would be itself a crime against society."

All this, it seems to us, is true; and it occurs to us also that the Freethinkers are in the same boat. It is true that Infidels do not teach as a religious duty that labor on Sunday is particularly righteous, but they do teach that it is just as righteous as working on any day. This they do from a common-sense standpoint, which would come under the statutory description of "otherwise" than as a religious duty. Therefore, if Idaho shall by law define labor on Sunday as a crime, and disfranchise all who advise, teach, counsel, or encourage it, the Freethinkers of the state, and they are legion, will hav to be hypocrits or be classed with Mormons and deprived of their voting rights.

So it is with a great many other things which are artificially made crimes by legislation. In some states, like New Jersey, for instance, speaking contumeliously of Christ is blasphemy, and blasphemy is a crime. Yet there are thousands of Freethinkers, particularly in the boundless West, who, to destroy the superstitions clustered around that individual, do speak of Christ in just that manner, and example is the greatest of all encouragement. But supposing Idaho should borrow New Jersey's blasphemy law! Another artificial crime is selling beer. Per se, there is nothing criminal in selling beer, but it is clear that under this test oath, and with a prohibitory law, beer sellers would be disfranchised, and so would all anti-prohibitionists who advised resistance to the law. Sumptuary laws make artificial crimes, and dozens of other legal regulations erect into crimes acts which in themselvs are perfectly harmless.

The oath, therefore, very plainly goes too far. If it should be rigorously administered, the voters of Idaho would be diminished to an extremely small proportion of the population. Most people object to some one or another of their state's statutes, and suppose Anarchists Tucker and Pentecost, who object to all laws, should move out to Idaho—why, two of the most intelligent and best citizens of the state couldn't get within miles of the polls!

Editorial Notes.

It is remarkable, says the Denison Gazetteer, that in this country of boasted religious liberty, Christians use the civil courts to prosecute other Christians who insist upon obeying the Bible by working six days and resting on the seventh. Men hav actually been fined and imprisoned in Arkansas and Tennessee, by Christian judges and juries, for this.

An insane girl in this city stole her sister's savings, amounting to over seven hundred dollars, and put them into a church contribution-box. The priest refuses to refund the cash, and the courts must be appealed to. The sister is a poor working girl, and, considering the circumstances, the priest must be awarded the palm as the meanest man in the city.

At the State Fair at Syracuse, last week, Chauncey Mitchell Depew made a speech to the farmers, and held their English brother up to pity because he "first pays the landlord, then the parson, then the government, before there is any left for himself." As long as the farmer of this state pays the taxes on over a hundred millions of exempt church property we do not see where he has much the advantage of his English peer.

The New South Wales legislativ assembly has rejected, by thirty-two votes to eleven, a motion "that in the opinion of the House it is desirable that the business upon each sitting day be opened with prayer." The New South Wales Parliament is wise, says Mrs. Besant, who givs a description of how the prayer business works in her own country. She says: "Anything more comically absurd than the opening of our Commons House, as seen from the lofty eyrie of the ladies' gallery, it would be hard to find. Half a dozen elderly gentlemen dotted over a bare expanse of seats; one with his face pushed into his hat, as though shortsightedly studying the maker's name. Another balanced on his seat on his knees, with his legs stuck straight out behind him, the soles of his boots offering themselvs, apparently, for the bastinado. A third grasping his forehead with one hand and his elbow with the other, seemingly in the throes of an overpowering headache. And then the funny little duet between speaker and chaplain, accentuating the crying absurdity of the whole ceremony. The colonists do wisely not to begin with prayers which nobody cares for."

The Ponderous Mind of the Independent was last directed to the consideration of the Important Question whether or not Jesus ever slept. The Masterful Conclusion was: "We hav no doubt that, being a man, and, as such, subject to the usual laws of our common humanity, he often slept and woke, and that sleep with him was just what it is with other men. His divinity did not supersede this necessity, or make the sleep any the less real. Like all other men, he needed sleep for physical recuperation." The Ponderous Mind evidently has slid back about fifteen or sixteen centuries to the time of the "Christian Fathers" who used to write long essays on Jesus's personal habits and general physical conformation.

Up here in New York the Republicans want to apply an educational test to voters in order to disfranchise several thousand ignorant Irishmen who vote the Democratic ticket. Down in Mississippi the Democrats propose to apply the same test to keep from the polls several thousand negroes who hav contracted the habit of voting the Republican ticket. The joke of it is that in New York the Democrats denounce the scheme as unconstitutional, against American principles, and outrageous in its invasion of human rights. In Mississippi, however, they hold it to be none of these things. The Republicans, of course, reverse the reasoning. All of which is instructiv, though Jevons and Mill would probably find somewhere a flaw in the logic.

The Democrats of Kansas hav nominated ex-Governor Chas. Robinson, whom the preachers are pelting with the epithet, "Infidel," for governor. One plank of their platform is as follows: "We deplore the tendency manifested by the preacher politicians who pose as the leaders of the Republican party in this state toward ecclesiasticism in the management of public affairs, which would make religious belief the test of eligibility for political preferment, and declare our unalterable opposition thereto." Another plank reads as follows: "We believe that prohibition has brought upon the people of the state incalculable evils, and has tended to produce as its legitimate result perjury and bribery; has corrupted the very foundations of justice by a system of hired spies, and made at times our courts a disgrace in the administration of public justice."

In a sermon two weeks ago, Dr. Thomas, of Chicago, read an extract from a Roman Catholic journal calling the public schools of that city "dens of vice and immorality," and advising that "they be allowed to go where they sprang from—the devil." Dr. Thomas's comment upon this was, "I wonder why so many of their young ladies are allowed to teach in our public schools," a reflection which led a lay brother to remark to his neighbor that fully one-third of all the female teachers in Chicago were Roman Catholics. This proportion is under rather than over the proportion in New York, and if the schools are not redeemed from Catholic political rule they will be broken up. We heard the other day of a little girl sent to a public school who returned home declaring she would not go again, the teacher talked and acted so. It's a nice condition the Catholics hav reduced the city to!

The religion-in-the-schools question is constantly coming up, here, there, and everywhere. This time it is in Ohio. The Cleveland World says: "When State School Commissioner Hancock returns to Columbus from his trip to Caldwell and other points in the eastern part of the state he will be asked to decide a question of religion in the common schools, which came in his mail yesterday. It comes from a town in the Western Reserve and is propounded by a parent who objects to having the scriptures read in the presence of his children. The teacher to whom they are sent, he says, persists in devoting a portion of each day to scriptural reading, and as his children are compelled to be present, according to the schoolroom rule, or be reprimanded, he demands to know whether he cannot legally withdraw his children during this hour. We hope Mr. Hancock will be equal to the emergency and settle the question for that school finally by ordering all religious exercises to be discontinued."

"Christian civilization" is supposed by Christians to be in full bloom in this country. Here is a specimen of it as developed by the Rev. Mr. Lansing, of Worcester, Mass.: "Mr. Lansing read statistics showing that in 1885, out of 110,000 young girls in Massachusetts, 70,000 were working in factories for wages which averaged from $2 10 to $4.50 per week. At the end of each instance he asked if the wages were too low. Then he said that a gentleman of his acquaintance told him that a pretty young girl came to his place of business one day and asked for work as a seamstress. The gentleman inquired what she had been getting, and she told him, remarking that it would not pay her board. She asked for higher wages, 'for,' said she, 'must I go out on the street and sell myself? I must do it or starve if I do not receive larger wages.' Another gentleman," continued the speaker, "told me of a girl who went to another man with a similar request. He told her how to make more money. He ought to be hanged for what he told her, and he will be eternally damned for it."

The ex-reverend Hugh O. Pentecost has been obliged to take a cheaper hall in this city for his winter's lectures because of the falling off of contributions; and there is no doubt, he says, that this decrease is the result of his "growing radicalism during the past year." We are very sorry for Mr. Pentecost, but hope he will keep on growing, notwithstanding. There is no man whose mental development we hav watched with more interest, and if we hav sometimes thought he was dragging his anchor and drifting beyond soundings, the spectacle has afforded us none the less gratification. As an example of the extremest of the extreme individualists he is invaluable to the world. His aggressivness is so mingled with passivness—at the same time a John Brown and a Tolstoi; his logic is so mixed up with sentiment; his hatred of monopolies is so plainly fed by the very individualistic arguments that support them in their selfishness; he is so contradictory and yet so earnest, that we doubt if even philosopher Stephen Pearl Andrews could reconcile his teachings. But the realm of liberty is infinit; let him grow. One who is not an Anarchist can only stand aside and admire; he should not attempt to criticise until Mr. Pentecost's anchor takes hold and he fetches up.

> "For he is great who fronts all shame,
> And dares to name it by its name,
> Yet feels his breast burn warm for those > Hard struggling in temptation's throes."

A Mr. Hutchins was "ordained" as a preacher in Brooklyn a few days ago. At the ceremony Dr. Armitage said Mr. Hutchins was going to California, "among giants in intellect, among cultured people. He should not argue with Infidelity and the defectiv thought he might meet. An Infidel never in the world was converted by argument. 'Put the golden trumpet of the gospel to your lips and blow with all your might.'" The Brooklyn friend, Mr. Edwards Rousseau, who sends the report of the proceeding, explains: "My only purpose in afflicting you with it is to call your attention to a paragraph [the above] I hav marked. You will observe that Dr. Armitage told Mr. Hutchins that the people of California 'were giants in intellect,' and warned the youthful Mr. Hutchins not to 'argue with Infidelity and the defectiv thought he might meet.' In other words, he told Mr. Hutchins to giv George E. Macdonald and Samuel Putnam a wide berth if he did not wish to get knocked out. Mr. Armitage's 'pawkiness' is only equaled by his impudence in calling thought other than his own 'defectiv.' But then, Mr. Armitage is a man of God, a 'Reverend,' with a big R, aye, even a 'D.D.,' with two big D's, and of course when he says Infidelity is defectiv thought, why, that should settle the matter off-hand, and such intellectual infants as Ingersoll, Bradlaugh, Macdonald, et al, should hide their diminished heads. They hav never studied the science by which the impossible is demonstrated, and so it is exceeding cheeky in them to hav any thoughts of their own, even if their thoughts are worthless and 'defectiv.' In all kindness I advise them to join the Baptist church fold, of which the meek and modest Dr. Armitage is shepherd. His thought, not being defectiv, will be of almost inestimable value to them. Kneeling at his feet and basking in the sunlight of his intellectuality, they will be brought to see the error of their ways and the perfection of his. But as 'an Infidel never in the world was converted by argument,' I suppose they hav the infinit impudence to think they know at least as much as a reverend gentleman, who, in acquiring a knowledge of theology, had the major portion of his common sense educated out of him. And so I shall leave your witty brother and his companions in sin to their fate, which I strongly suspect will be ours also."

Since Senator John J. Ingalls of Kansas uttered his famous Agnostic eulogy of a dead brother senator he has been under pressure from the church to conceal his sentiments. His latest eulogy, of Senator Beck, is a queer specimen of oratorical straddle—of a desire to stick to facts and at the same time keep his political fences up in the church. The following are some of his sentences pronounced in the Senate, August 28th: "The proscription [of death] extends alike to the individual and the type. Nations die and races expire. Humanity itself is destined to extinction. Sooner or later it is the instruction of science that the energy of the earth will be expended, and it will become incapable of supporting life. A group of feeble and pallid survivors in some sheltered valley in the tropics will behold the sun sink below the horizon and the pitiless stars glitter in the midnight sky. The last man will perish, and the sun will rise upon an earth without an inhabitant. Its atmosphere, its seas, its life and heat, will vanish, and the planet will be an idle cinder uselessly spinning in its orbit. There is an intelligence so vast and enduring that the flaming intervals between the birth and death of universes is no more than the flash of fireflies above the meadows of summer; a colossal power by which these stupendous orbs are launched in the abyss, like bubbles blown by a child in the morning sun, and whose sense of justice and reason cannot be less potential than those immutable statutes that are the law of being to the creatures he has made, and which compel them to declare that if the only object of creation is destruction, if infinity is the theater of an uninterrupted series of irreparable calamities, if the final cause of life is death, then time is an inexplicable tragedy, and eternity an illogical and indefensible catastrophe. No, Mr. President, this obsequy is for the quick and not for the dead. It is not an inconsolable lamentation. It is a strain of triumph. It is an affirmation to those who survive, that, as our departed associate, contemplating at the close of his life the monument of good deeds he had erected, more enduring than brass and loftier than the pyramids of kings, might exclaim with the Roman poet, 'Non omnis moriar,' so, turning to the silent and unknown future, he could rely with just and reasonable confidence upon that most impressiv and momentous assurance ever delivered to the human race, 'He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he liv; and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die.'" If the earth is to be extinguished by natural causes, and if the future is unknown, why should a belief in Christ be looked upon as a reasonable assurance that man will never die? As an Agnostic Christian Mr. Ingalls is not a success. He is too much of the first to be good as the second.

MR. EDITOR: We hav received the "Pictorial Text-Book" and are much pleased with it. We do not see how it could be got out so cheap. J. A. AKERS.

CASTANA, IA., Aug. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6—$3 on subscription, $3 for the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," $1 for "The Bible, Whence and What?" by Richard B. Westbrook. With best wishes for the future success of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its cause, I am, Very truly, A. A. DAVIS.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Sept. 16, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," which you sent to me at Cooperstown, N. Y., was received. Friends and relativs borrow it and find the illustrations attractiv, to the point, and backed up by quotations and proofs that are conclusiv, they all admit. The volume is very cheap at $2. WM. J. BRYAN.

SALIDA, COL., Sept. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Why will the Liberals persistently misrepresent? The issue over Harman is one of words, not ideas. The right of discussion "in decent language" is fully guaranteed by Judge Foster. He also decides that woman is the equal of man in all things in Kansas. For this he deserves the thanks of every woman. But nowhere except in the church abuse of David can a parallel be found for the gross injustice and black ingratitude exhibited by Liberals toward Foster, many of whom, including Harman, are not lawhonest in their treatment of women. G. M. OVERTON.

ATHENS, GA., Sept. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please send the "Pictorial Text-Book." I hope you will put the biblical illustrations of THE TRUTH SEEKER in book form. If so, put my name down for a copy. I will try and sell some of the "Pictorial Text-Books" for you as soon as I get mine to go prospecting with. Everybody in this town ought to own a copy, as this is a church-ridden place, where one can hear prayers or psalms sung every day right in the business portions of the city, and on Sunday everybody and everything goes to church apparently, as one can see the streets around the churches literally crowded with horses, mules, and buggies. To-day our horse and buggy ran away. I did not learn the cause, but from the way they got down the street and out of sight I am led to suppose the minister must hav got off a chestnut which gave them offense. Hoping Mr. Heston will soon be able to resume his labors in the pictorial department of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am, Respectfully, C. E. MOORE.

BUSHNELL, ILL., Sept. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I want to second with all my might J. H. Burnham, especially the pungent words in the last paragraph of his article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 6th, on the word religion. It has no meaning in science, no relation to morality. Yet some good and able men sometimes use the word, as "true religion," "right kind of," etc. And even Dr. York in a late article has "false religion," as though there was a true religion. Mr. Burnham says, "We hav words which are competent to do service in all the varying conditions of social life without the use of that word." It is solely definable as a belief in the supernatural, which has been a curse in all ages. In Shelley's burning words,

> Religion, . . . prolific fiend, . . .
> Thou taintest all thou look'st upon.

Every effort, and all occasions, should be employed by Freethinkers to broaden the line between religion and morality.

I inclose $2 for the "Freethinkers' Text-Book."

MR. EDITOR: You do not believe in witches, do you? I wish you had accompanied me to the tent-meeting of Mrs. Woodsworth here last Friday night, a week ago last night. A friend and myself went to see her. She is undoubtedly a fair hypnotist, and a bold one. She operates on the heads of the victims with the old well-known motions of the public (so-called) mesmerist. But she has an auxiliary called Ott who gets down at the anxious seat and operates on what is called the media nerves, beginning at the top of the thumbs. This motion is much harder to detect, being comparativly unknown to the public. This makes him a much more dangerous operator than his superior. She has also another assistant, whose business it seems to be to prepare the victims for the operators. This third one is a lady. She passes around the circle and raises up the hands of the intended victims and puts them in proper positions to be operated to the best advantage. This is the power by which religionists are enabled to do so much damage to the ignorant and unwary, and their strongest ally is the Materialist who denies the possibility of the damage done by hypnotism and alchemy.

Witchcraft or voodooism is a combination in which are included hypnotism and alchemy, etc.—in fact, all things which go to make up art-magic. Religion is but another name for black magic, and the priest differs in no way from the common negro voodoo or the wizard of old, only in his pretensions, which are all false. He uses the same books (to wit, the sixth and seventh books of Moses, etc.) and the same class of drugs used by other classes of magicians. No religion is without its wizard or witch, or as we say, hypnotist. I suppose many will say, "I cannot be mesmerized." Perhaps many cannot, without the presence of alchemy, which very few seem to count as a part of the process; but there are but very few who cannot be hypnotized by any ordinary hypnotist if he calls to his aid the use of alchemy, which is a part of this branch of art-magic called religion. And whilst the religionists are allowed the undisputed use of alchemy and hypnotism we shall hav religion. And whilst we hav religion we shall hav wizards and witches and they will hav their victims, and some of their victims will undoubtedly be our nearest and dearest friends. And many of us who would do anything possible to protect ourselvs and friends from the baneful influence of these vampires are their greatest defenders, and protect them where they could not protect themselvs, by denying the possibility of their crimes. If it were possible for those who represent the Freethinking press to send persons who understand the workings of hypnotic influences and alchemy amongst those people for the facts in this connection, what great things might be accomplished for the truth. MARY DUFF.

MR. EDITOR: I see my friend J. A. Tuttle, Esq., of Brooklyn, N. Y., is after me again with a sharp stick. But unfortunately it is composed of very poor material, and does not hurt worth a cent. I wish to inform him that his abusiv letter reminds me of a tempest in a teapot. Now, we hav just had a cyclone in our city, and it was a very destructiv one at that. It tore down and injured several hundred houses and killed sixteen people, besides crippling many more; and after passing through that, how could I be disturbed by the bluster of Mr. Tuttle? Why, its blowing seems like a gentle zephyr, and it simply makes me smile to read such trash. There is not a particle of argument or information contained in the whole blast.

Some months ago he wrote an absurd article about Spiritism, as he calls it, in which he made the statement that he could not or would not believe his own senses on what he might witness of Spiritism; that the senses could not be relied upon, etc.; and he referred to various facts to sustain his position, as the rising of the sun, etc. If my memory serves me rightly, this idea I completely refuted by showing that although a partial observation of one sense might lead astray, yet when all the senses were brought into play the truth would at last be made plain, and that then such truth became knowledge ascertained, and was what we call science. If we ignore the senses we hav nothing left to rest an argument upon or to reason from, and as he never has disputed my points, I had hoped that he considered me right and dropped that part of the argument, for how were all the facts of science established but by the senses? He also asserted that weight was a property of matter, and of course disputed the well-known laws of attraction of gravitation, which no one at all versed in physics to-day doubts. If a piece of matter weighs one hundred pounds in one place and eighty pounds some other place, removed from the earth's surface, the difference must be in a law of attraction and not in the change of the matter. How simple! and yet this man who disputes these well-established truths prates about science. The fact is, I so clearly showed Mr. Tuttle by my illustrations that he did not know what he was talking about that it has rankled his mind and made him mad, decidedly furious, and not having anything to sustain his absurd doctrins and theories he pitches into me personally, and tries to abuse me by saying I am a liar and quibbler and ruffian, and in the same paragraph declares himself a bigger ruffian than I am. I objected to arguing about the facts of Spiritualism with him, as I before stated, because he said in the outset that he would not believe the phenomena if he saw them with his own eyes, and heard with his own ears, or felt with his own hands. That was the substance of his statement. Now, taking him at his word, how useless a task for me to make ever so honest a statement of what I saw, heard, or felt, for if Mr. Tuttle could not believe his own senses how could he believe what I experienced? The truth is, the man who cannot place confidence in his own judgment or the evidence of his own senses, is beyond the pale of reason and cannot be argued with or convinced. You might as well attempt to talk sense to a donkey or dispute with an idiot.

Now, in regard to the facts of Spiritualism Mr. Tuttle is a confessed know-nothing. He knows nothing about them, and by his own showing never can, because he cannot believe the evidence of his own senses, and of course no such person can be brought to study the facts of Spiritualism. He simply says to the world: I am an ignoramus and I am bound to remain one, because I cannot, on such an important affair, believe my own mind, and of course I cannot believe what any other mind says. That is the logic of a bigot, who, while he confesses his own inability to investigate a subject, assumes that nobody is any more capable of doing so than himself. Presto, what philosophy!

Some forty years ago I was brought into contact with modern Spiritualism by means of reading reports of the Rochester knockings, and subsequently I witnessed table-moving and the rappings. I noticed that by these raps, made at times in various parts of the room, either upon floor, walls, or ceiling, or other parts, and on furniture, a certain amount of intelligence was manifested. The movements were independent of any person composing the circle, and the raps came in response to our thoughts, unexpressed often, giving information known to no one present, but which facts were afterward verified. Now, although these simple and undignified raps were made since 1848, up to the present time, and intelligence has been imparted thereby, all the would-be philosophers of the know-nothing Tuttle stripe hav been unable to explain them to this day, and finally, in sheer despair, they hav come to the conclusion to not only close their ears to the sound thereof, but they at last declare that they hav lost all faith in the human senses, and refuse to believe "though one rose from the dead." What a humiliating spectacle to behold! Driven to the wall with an avalanche of facts and manifestations, they deny the subject by proclaiming themselvs a pack of asses, because to admit the phenomena and the intelligence given would be to acknowledge defeat. The fact that mountebanks hav set up shows to gull people out of their money is no argument against Spiritualism, for in four cases out of five the deceivers never were Spiritualists, and the one part in five become tricksters because of their own worthless natures, and because they could not control the spirits and Spiritualism to their own special benefit. Therefore trickery is no excuse. The man who reasons, and who is guided by reason, must be able to select the grain from the chaff, and let the latter be carried away by the wind. But Mr. Tuttle is unfortunate in his scientific notions, for he sets aside the well-established law of attraction and attributes the weight of matter to a property within it, instead of something acting upon it from the outside, and this has convinced me that Mr. Tuttle knows as little about matter and its laws as he does about spirits and the laws which govern them. Of the one error I had hopes of convincing him, of the other it would be utterly impossible.

Mr. Tuttle says that I am a ruffian, "and perceiving that he had a ruffian to deal with, he acknowledges that he used rough language, and means to let me know that he will stick to me and giv as good as he gets." He says, "I shall endeavor to stay by him until he is satisfied that I can giv as good as I get and a liberal rate of interest." Now, Mr. Tuttle, if you claim the distinction of being a greater ruffian than I am, which your intemperate language shows, I am already satisfied that you are entitled to that distinction, and you need not write any more abusiv letters. I yield the palm to you already, so desist from trying to convince the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that you are a greater ruffian than I, as I do not think they will be edified by your further efforts in that direction. You hav amply shown your skill in the use of abusiv epithets. I yield! But when you say that you do not oppose science, but only the vagaries and theories of so-called science, and in the next breath assert a vagary on the properties of the weight of matter, which sets aside the law of attraction and gravitation, I think you deserve the palm as the greatest quibbler I ever encountered, and if I am wrong I wish you would write your best article and show why weight is a property of matter, and the cause of its motion. To that I could giv respectful attention.

Yours truly, J. R. PERRY.

OLIVE BRANCH, MISS., Sept. 10, 1890—E.M. 290.

MR. EDITOR: In writing this letter for your columns it is my purpose, first to seek friendship, congeniality, and sympathy among your many intelligent readers, and then to inform them how much a Liberal may be made to suffer in a so-called religious community. Three years ago I came to this state, young and poor, but with that all-sufficient recommendation with Baptists, a letter of church membership in the Baptist church. Soon, and without effort upon my part, I was drawn into society with them, feasted, praised, called on to pray and talk in the churches, and in every way drawn prominently to the front. Every man of them and his neighbor said I would preach. Every man and his wife said I was bound to make my mark, that I should be a Spurgeon, and things of that sort. Well, I was not a hypocrit. I thought that the true impulse of my nature was love for God and his people, born of the suffering of Christ on the cross. I thought it was a wonder and a pity that God did not convert Ingersoll and turn him into a Baptist preacher, and I thought again sometimes that God was using him as a whetstone to whet up dull Christians on. I had been told so, taught it from my cradle up, and knew no better. I thought, and, dear brother Liberals, I feel safe in saying that fully half of the orthodox Christians now think, that Ingersoll is the only man on earth that denies the existence of a living God. Such is our Robert's fame that he is known of even in the ranks of superstition where a Freethought paper, pamphlet, or book is burnt as soon as it falls into orthodox hands. Well, to go on with my narrativ, it soon began to be said of me that I was engaged to one of the prettiest and sweetest girls in the Baptist flock, and although some of the brethren said it was against God's ban for cousins to marry, the wedding took place. And some people do say it so shocked the young and unmarried pastor of our church when he heard that of this sister, whom he had looked on as his, just waiting for a convenient season to tell her of his God-inspired love. etc., that he had to return home without delivering the sermon one fourth Sunday in March, to conceal his chagrin. Meanwhile, I myself, thinking how easy it would be to preach, and seeing how much the preachers were loved for God's sake, and noticing how rich and happy they seemed when compared with their flocks, and thinking thereby to do much good in the world, went to studying carefully the Bible in order to be ready for the work. I began in Genesis and went forward. I was shocked almost to insanity at finding evidence in every chapter that the God I had been serving was the most monstrous of all the monsters of whom I had ever heard, and the most cruel of all tyrants that ever ruled. Then, just as I finished the first five books, I found it there, plain and indisputable, that this divinely inspired writer wrote up an account of his own death and burial while he was yet alive. Well, in a word, I laid aside the holy book and went and told my betrothed that I found the Bible to be a book of Jewish mythology and worth no more to liv by than Grecian mythology or the "Arabian Nights." She was surprised! and shocked! Oh, yes! But I was only a Bible skeptic then, only an infant thinker, and I told her that I did not believe in Bible or hell, but still thought there was a loving heavenly father, and a beautiful heaven where everybody would go when they received punishment for their sins here, which they would while living. Then she was not shocked any more, and her big, sweet, blue eyes filled with tears; and we were married soon after. She had eighty acres of land, and I had muscle and will—and nothing else. I built a two-room log-house and filled up the cracks with lime-mortar, made it smooth with a trowel; scrubbed the floors clean and white; moved in without any furniture except a few chairs, a bed, and a cook-stove, and went to work. In a short time out-houses loomed up, cotton blossoms and potato vines covered the ground, big watermelons grew thick in the patches, and by winter that year the little two-room log-house was made comfortable, neat, and cosy; and all the neighbors said, "That boy loves his wife and means to take care of her." Meanwhile, again, I had been thinking, and had come to the logical conclusion that I was an Atheist. This without ever reading a Freethought paper or knowing that such a paper was ever printed. One day in a crowd of men some one suggested that I knew a little about the Bible, and thereupon one old man began at once to belabor me with comments upon the wisdom of Solomon. I had been for months waiting for just such an opportunity to come out boldly on the side of truth, and quick as thought I let him hav it—that I did not find so much wisdom in Solomon, and that really, to judge him by his actions, I thought him to be the biggest fool I had ever read of. Arguments followed about Noah's ark and the existence of God and other Bible matters, and the outcome of it was that the next week a committee of brethren was to see me. I denied to them the existence of a God, and so shocked them that they asked me to kneel with them in prayer. I readily complied, and when that had finished I invited them to remain while I too offered a prayer. Then I gave them Dr. Monroe's "Almighty Man" with all the pomp and zeal of a D.D., and they left in pious rage. Since then I hav subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Ironclad Age and as fast as I get them and read them to a finish, I start them away on mission work among the Christians. Finding themselvs powerless to hold me down in an argument, they hav now resorted to slander and outrage. They hav organized a social boycott against me, and vowed that my influence was bad and that none of them will ever in any way recognize me intimately. All this is hard. And what is worse, somebody has poisoned my horse and my cow, the only property of my own that I had, and that I had worked hard for the last two years. My little family is now four, and everything pulling against me makes it hard lines, and makes me long for congenial companionship and words of sympathy. My wife and I love and cherish each other, but she is still as big a Baptist as I am an Atheist and we never mention God or his book to each other. Now, friends, I want a word of encouragement from each of you, and I want also to make to you this appeal. I am bound to become a lecturer for the cause of Liberalism. I am a student, such a one as will learn a lesson from each object that my vision falls upon, but I need Freethought literature to fit me for my work. I need works on geology, evolution, philosophy, and astronomy, and I need and would be proud of any old book that any of you would feel that you could spare, or any old papers that you may hav on hand either. Will not some of the great and good Liberals help me to deal Christianity a telling stroke by aiding me in this direction? Let me say to you that I'm going to lecture—I mean it. And any person who will send me a book can hav it returned if he so desires as soon as I can read it carefully, and anyone who will lend a helping hand will, if I liv, see it do good for the great cause of Liberalism. Will not some of the great authors who read this send me one of their books? Address as below and the postmaster here will know whom you mean, or address as below and my real name will be forwarded. With thanks to the Editor and good will to all,

GRAY ATHEIST, Olive Branch, Miss.

TYNGSBORO, MASS., Sept. 14, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Friend Hagen does me the honor to devote a column and more to my brief notice of his brochure. He unfairly accuses me of unfairness. I will repeat the quotation to show whether it was "garbled." "I shall consider this positiv proof that consciousness is a natural property of an electric current generated by the conscious part of the nerves and brain." Of course consciousness, or what is conscious, may develop more consciousness, but the original consciousness of the part is as much in question as anything else. Lucidity is not gained by misuse of words. I suppose he means that a certain part of the nerves and brain becomes conscious by the operation of an electric current. He should hav said so, and not left it to be guessed at. The language was what I criticised, and such slipshod writing is what plays hob with "popular science" and "plain talk," in fact with most alleged philosophical literature all the way through the gamut from Joe Cook to Herbert Spencer. The very phrenologists he quotes profess a belief in immortality. Maybe when friend Hague has been dead a thousand years he will wake up and find he is no more ended than he was this morning.

Friend Hague should not think that I was trying to prove that death did not end all, but that I simply sought to show that his dogma was not proved. His dogmatism consists in calling his theory his knowledge by revelation of nature. Nature has revealed to him no such thing, by his own showing. He attempts to prove that death ends all by the phenomena of unconsciousness in syncope and sleep and the return of consciousness without memory of what time had passed. He is very much mistaken, also, in calling it death when there is only asphyxiation and life enough remaining to make resuscitation possible. His kind of death did not end all or there had been no more breath. The argument he attempts is the very one assumed by the other side to show that the soul, whatever that may be supposed to be, is unaffected by the conditions of the body, as he may see by reading Wayland's "Intellectual Philosophy" or Brittan's "Man and His Relations." I hope I hav now been plain enough to be understood by friend Hague. If he wants to know how much of a dilettant I am he may come and help me do farm-work.

I will devote the remainder of this letter to another correspondent and another subject.

The Shepherd of Leavenworth plain attempts to take me to task in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 6th, for having proposed Kansas as a successful sample of Prohibition.

My argument was based upon a quoted statement of that state's illustrious senator, Ingalls, whilst he, the said Shepherd, does not advance a single voucher for his asseverations. The presumption of this court is that he gets his misinformation from the rum papers, as they hav been in the habit during the last decade of printing that sort of stuff. It is a little queer, though, that those whose interest, as proprietors and patronizers of the liquor business, is on the side of the largest sales and easiest access, are the very ones who vigorously cry that Prohibition is a failure. It is also somewhat cross-legged logic, like a drunken man's walk, to claim that Prohibition laws do not prohibit, and that people are leaving the state because they cannot get their swig. But the rumocracy, like orthodox religion, does not hold itself bound to be consistent. For my part, however, I should rather choose a country that the rum swine and beer-sellers had abandoned. A state's wealth does not consist so much in the number as in the character of its citizens, and if the bad rubbish will leave of its own accord it will save buying ropes to giv them a lift.

The law is not my idol, but unless the gentle Shepherd wants all the world to be a Donnybrook fair, and his song is, "Whack, Hurrah, for Lanigan's Ball!" he will not object to a little legal suasion to secure some of the rights and a little of the liberty of sober, honest men. That is why I want the law, with all other rational means, enlisted to lessen and erase the liquor curse. Contrary to the gospel shepherd, the Kansas Shepherd prays to be led into temptation. I think temptation to good behavior better than an enticement to evil conduct. Were it not so the state should put a bounty on inducements to crime, and the Shepherd should drive his sheep into the thief's inclosure for his moral good.

Ever since the first priest called the first disputer of his divine claims and impudent assumptions an "Infidel dog," it has been found easier for falsehood and ignorance to call names and make faces than it is to strive to maintain a bad cause by logical inference and scientific induction. For that reason the prairie Shepherd has ranked me a "Puritan." I cannot recall that I hav been so termed but twice before. Once when in a military institution I insisted on a little regard for soberness and decency, and gained my point and the sauceboxes' apology, and once when, through Moses Hull's paper, I asked Ezra H. Heywood why his sympathies went out so much more freely toward the cut-throat Mollie Maguires than what he had to bestow upon the luckless laborers whom they beat down for trying to earn a scanty living. I am sorry for Heywood's bad fix. Though I think his course injudicious I do not count Ezra's error a crime, but the Christian malice that sent him to prison is not the fault of law but of theology. His trial I deem illegal persecution for opinion's sake.

It is very true, I am of Puritan ancestry, and of ancient Salem stock at that, though none of my name are on record as having had a hand in hanging witches. Indeed, some of my near kin to-day, had they lived in Mather's time, would hav gone to the gibbet by that sign. Whilst I know what all manner of mean treatment is that ignorant and hypocritical godly piety can heap upon one who has brains enough to think, tongue enough to talk, and grit enough to speak his mind, yet I hav found no insolence that can equal the impudence of dram-drinkers and liquor-sellers, both in voice and act. Their very claim to the rights, liberties, and respect due decent and industrious people is itself the mockery of morals and an insult to principle. The only time that I, with all my Atheism, was ever troubled with law was when once I said I did not care a damn for all the drunken rum-sellers on the police force, and half a dozen or so of them rushed out of a neighboring saloon, and amid the din of fire-alarms tore me away from my hotel. Well, they did not make their "blasphemy" charge work worth a damn (a damn is a piece of India money), nor can the advocates of alcohol be more successful with their "Puritan" gag.

Liquor lovers should not suppose that Prohibitionists hav hydrophobia, as the aforesaid Shepherd conjectures. The temperance folks usually are, like the Baptists, fond of water, but that epithet comes as near the truth as one can be expected to diagnose who sees things through liquor glasses. I hav occasionally seen members of the Good Templars badly out of order; indeed, so far over the bay that they had to leave the lodge. I would not presume to say whether that was the case with our whilom Kansas brother unless I knew, but if he, when a member, was of his present opinion, he must hav been initiated with his ears plugged, for that organization is pledged to Prohibition from the word go.

As I hav repeatedly said, if the church is running the temperance business, so much the worse for outsiders. I do not know what is the matter with so-called Infidels at this period that they, so many of them, only ask liberty to drink like the devil and play hell generally. This fact goes farther than any and all else toward establishing the correctness of the condemning epithet. It was the "Infidels" who hav headed every reform in the past. Indeed, it was "Infidels" who started the Washingtonian movement. It was "Infidels" who originated the first Prohibition party, with Ella E. Gibson as orator, and Wendell Phillips as presidential candidate. And even now, Dr. Blackmer, the Christian gubernatorial candidate of the Massachusetts Prohibition party, lectures the churches to abandon their old conservativ policy, and advance instead for the liberation of humanity from the dominion of drink and the reign of ruin. With the animus of the present Prohibition party I am not dealing. If it is hypocritical it is because secular temperance does not bear its standard. My point is Prohibition itself, not statutes or parties, but execution, and we can hav it whenever temperance professors will practice temperance.

Those who think to pick me up on a shingle and throw me out of the window will do well to first take heed that I am not in the habit of making statements without having the papers to prove them. I will tender the Shepherd of bleeding Kansas a few spicy documents from people in his own state, who, by their position, are best qualified to report on the subject in question. If his anxious correspondents wish for more of the same brand let them write to me and I will try my best to get them a supply:

PROHIBITION PROHIBITS IN KANSAS.

Gov. John A. Martin, in his retiring message to the legislature in January, 1889, said:

"Fully nine-tenths of the drinking and drunkenness prevalent in Kansas eight years ago hav been abolished, and I affirm with earnestness and emphasis that this state, to-day, is the most temperate, orderly, sober community of people in this civilized world. The abolition of the saloon has not only promoted the personal happiness and general prosperity of our citizens, but it has enormously diminished crime, has filled thousands of homes where vice and want and wretchedness once prevailed, with peace, plenty, and contentment, and has materially increased the trade and business of those engaged in the sale of useful and wholesome articles of merchandise. Notwithstanding the fact that the population of the state is increasing, the number of criminals confined in our penitentiary is steadily decreasing. Many of our jails are empty, and all show a marked falling off in the number of prisoners confined. The dockets of our courts are no longer burdened with long lists of criminal cases. In the Capital district, containing a population of nearly 60,000, not a single criminal case was on the docket when the present term began. The business of the police courts of its larger cities has dwindled to one-fourth of its former proportions, while in cities of the second and third class the occupation of police authorities is practically gone."

Gov. Lyman U. Humphrey, in his inaugural address, January, 1889, said:

"The growth of public sentiment in support of constitutional Prohibition in Kansas is steady, healthy, and unmistakable. In the last campaign, no political party had the temerity to demand a resubmission of the question to the people in the face of a popular verdict that has been repeated and emphasized every time the popular sense has been taken. As an issue in Kansas politics, resubmission is as dead as slavery. The saloon as a factor in politics, as a moral iniquity, has been outlawed, a fugitiv and a vagabond on the face of the earth, or that part of it within the territorial limits of Kansas."

The attorney-general, in his last report, just published, says:

"The people are beginning to see the results. The taxpayer begins to feel it. The wives and children of the reformed inebriates experience the change. Prohibition is here to stay; it is a fixed fact. A vote of the people would never erase it. It is depopulating our penitentiary, and reducing pauperism and crime to the minimum. The saloon has been banished from Kansas soil, and already the result can be appreciated. The county jails throughout the state are comparativly empty, and the number of convicts in the penitentiary is growing less.

"Has Prohibition driven emigration from Kansas?

"Has Prohibition driven capital from Kansas?

"Has Prohibition debased the morals of the people of Kansas?

"Is Prohibition a success in Kansas?

"We had a dram-shop law from 1874 to 1881, and during that time the average annual increase in the population of the state was, in round numbers, 12 000. We hav had Prohibition in Kansas from 1881 to date, and the average annual increase in the population of the state is, in round numbers, 82,000. In 1880 we had one city with 15,000 population. We now hav six cities in Kansas with population of from 15 000 to 45 000, and twenty-seven cities with population of more than 2,000 each.

"In 1880 the population of the state was 996,096. In 1888 the population of the state was at least 1,650,000, with a voting population of 335,000.

"We increased the area of cultivated lands in four years 6,756,873 acres. We increased the taxable value of property in four years $116,227,941.

"We built 1,591 school-houses in four years, worth $2,000,000.

"The increase in school population in four years is 120,760. Does this look as though people are afraid to bring their families to our state?

"Jan. 1, 1885, we had 4,543 miles of railroad in Kansas.

"Jan. 1, 1889, we had 9,698 miles of railroad, an increase in four years of 5,135 miles of main and side tracks, and more than was constructed in any other state in the Union during the same time.

"Dec. 31, 1886, we had 898 convicts in the penitentiary. Jan. 1, 1887, we had 900, only two more than in 1886. Aug. 17, 1888, we had only 854 convicts in the penitentiary, an actual decrease of forty-six in seven months.

"There is not a brewery in Kansas.

"There is not a distillery in Kansas.

"There is not a barrel of bonded liquor in Kansas.

"There is but one pauper to every 1,350 people in Kansas.

"Taxes in Kansas average only three and seven-tenths per cent on a valuation of property at one-third its true value.

"These facts hav been proclaimed by two governors to the Kansas legislature in January, 1889.

"Many of the city and county jails in Kansas are empty.

"Prohibition has come to stay in Kansas, and would be reaffirmed by a vote of at least 150,000 majority if resubmitted to the people.

"No man can truthfully deny these statements, no difference where he comes from. The records prove them.

"Prohibition is a success in Kansas. S. B. BRADFORD,
"Attorney-General of Kansas, 1884–88.
"March 13, 1889."

I hope the above will be satisfactory to those who wish to find the truth. To those seeking support for the cause of boose the prop of a beer-soaked and rum-reeking press will seem stronger than the writ of able governors and intelligent attorney-generals.

I think I hav been as explicit if not as poignant as my critic.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

My Doves.

I owned two little turtle-doves
Dressed in coat and gown of gray,
The sunlight making rainbow tints
On neck and breast, bright, not gay.

Lo vey lovey, I would say.
Coo oo oo, would answer they,
Coo oo oo, coo, coo, coo.
We love you, you, you, you.

Four years I've listened to their coo.
Four years I've cared for lovies.
I've nourished, loved, and petted them
Since they were baby dovies.

Loo vey lovey, I would say.
Coo oo oo, would answer they.
Coo oo oo, coo, coo, coo,
We love you, you, you, you.

They never failed me with their coo
Darkest night or brightest day;
If I but spoke or sang to them,
Quickly would be heard their lay.

Lo vey lovey, I would say.
Coo oo oo, would answer they.
Coo oo oo, coo, coo, coo,
We love you, you, you, you.

But downward swooped a butcher bird
Not long ago, and killed one pet;
Now, all alone, his little mate
Her loss can never forget.

Oh, in my heart I feel a pain,
As I list, and list in vain,
For coo oo oo, coo, coo.
We love you, you, you, you.

SADIE ATHENA MAGOON.

Station D, Los Angeles, Cal.

Life in the Backwoods.—Concluded.

The man might be a kidnapper, and would make all haste to some populous city, and there dispose of her children, dearer to her than her own heart's blood.

They all wept bitterly, while the mother thought she should go distracted.

They had never before been separated, and the agony and suspense was almost unendurable. The family increased their speed, and when they reached the place where the pedler had told the mother he should stop, she rushed into the house in a transport of pain and distress.

But, oh, how mortified she was when she entered the abode. There sat her Tommy and Katy on either side of the friendly pedler eating a huge slice of bread and butter, and laughing and chatting in a very lively manner. She thanked the good pedler so many times that he always thought she overdid the matter.

They staid at that place nearly a week to rest, the mother working to pay for their keeping.

One day their hostess gave the children some baskets and told them to go to the fields beyond the brook and see what they could find there.

They found—oh, such red, luscious strawberries.

When they returned with their laden baskets, how their bright eyes sparkled, and how red their lips were! And then such a delicious supper! Strawberries and cream—what a feast it was! The next morning the man of the house asked them if they had ever seen dogs making butter.

"Why, no, of course not," said Tony, laughing.

"We'll see! We'll see!" said the honest old farmer, harnessing the two dogs that he owned.

"They're much like human beings, you know," said he; "they all like to shirk work. Sometimes they will run away on churning days."

He thought it showed intelligence to thus giv him the slip, for he knew by experience it was mighty hard work to churn.

Near by this farmhouse lived a queer old lady who was fond of children, and full of droll stories, and she made many quaint speeches. Mrs. Stirling inquired of her her age. She said she had forgotten the year, but she believed it was in string-bean time—she had been extremely fond of them ever since.

After they were well rested they thought they would start again on their journey. The old farmer brought out the family chariot and two handsome horses.

"I want a hand in this trip from Canada to Massachusetts," said he, "so jump in. I'm going to drive you twenty-five miles, anyhow."

But for all the rides they obtained, they still had to walk many wearisome miles, and it was several weeks before they reached their destination in Massachusetts. And then they had not a thing to commence housekeeping with. But they, with great enterprise, hired a small tenement, and the neighbors, learning of the wonderful journey all the way from Canada, on foot most of the time, contributed provisions, and enough furniture to begin keeping house on a small scale. One lady who had known Mrs. Stirling in her youthful days gave her a bed and furnishings. This good lady lived to the age of one hundred and three years, but whether this longevity was attained on account of her great benevolence or not, I would not undertake to say. Her numerous descendants are well known for their intelligence and great moral worth. Addie and Maria obtained employment in a cotton mill, and Mrs. Stirling hired out as a washerwoman.

In that time a large amount of work was exacted for a small sum of money. Mrs. Stirling toiled six hours usually for twenty-five cents. After her day's work she and the little ones would go to the woods for fagots, and in this way obtained all the wood she needed. With a long pole and a hook attached to it she broke off many dead limbs from the old pine and oak trees. When they had collected fagots enough, or as much as they could carry, they would bind stout cords about them and drag them home. One day when thus engaged they met old Gaffer Smith. Tony was tugging away like a horse, with a monstrous load of brush in his handcart. Old Smith looked at the boy admiringly. He said, "Madam, I think that boy is the flower of your family."

"Yes, sir," was the reply, "he is the sun [son] flower."

When autumn came, Tony and Kate were sent to school. Tony's clothes were very worn and patched.

"Never mind, Tony," said his mother, "as soon as the girls get their month's pay you shall hav a new suit."

"No, mamma," said the bright boy, "you buy yourself a good flannel gown and a shawl."

"But, Tony, you will be cold," and the mother gazed fondly upon her brave-hearted boy.

"Then I'll run and get warm," laughed Tony.

"I hear, too," continued Mrs. Stirling, "that the boys make fun of you on account of your shabby clothes, and I do not like that."

"Pooh, mother! I can stand all that. You shall hav the clothes and I'll wait a spell longer for mine."

So when pay-day came Mrs. Stirling had the new gown and woolen shawl, and Tony waited another month for his new suit.

When his noble conduct became known his teacher made him a present of a fine fur cap.

It was some time befores the Stirlings had more than one chair. They were accustomed to sit on the bed and old boxes, but after a year they managed to liv a little more comfortably.

The children all grew up to womanhood and manhood. The girls married well, and Tony became a sailor. He went to a foreign land and after a while accumulated a snug fortune. Then he came home and surrounded his mother with every comfort and many luxuries, so that her last days are as happy as one might expect or desire. Tony still livs and is a great benefactor to the poor. He says he has been as poor as anybody, and knows just how it is.

The lesson of this true story is, that to lead a virtuous life, to do good, to be respectful, tender, and self-sacrificing, to practice the precepts of the wise, to be temperate, to shun evil and evil influences, must lead to real and permanent happiness, even in the backwoods.

MIRIAM.

THE AGE OF DISCRETION.—Thewald thought it very unfair to influence a child's mind by inculcating any opinions before it should hav come to years of discretion, and be able to choose for itself. I showed him my garden, and told him it was my botanic garden. "How so?" said he, "it is covered with weeds." "Oh," I replied, "that is because it has not yet come to its age of discretion and choice. The weeds, you see, hav taken the liberty to grow, and I thought it unfair in me to prejudice the soil in favor of roses and strawberries."—Coleridge.

An Appalled Guest.

This happened away in the backwoods of Arkansas. A tourist going over the state on horseback stopped for the night at one of the popular hotels of the locality. The hotel happened to be a log and slab affair of three rooms and the same number of beds, while the proprietor was the proud parent of nine wild and woolly sons under twelve years of age. After a supper of "hog and hom'ny" the host said to one of the boys:

"Come, Billy, get the broom straws."

Nine broom straws of unequal lengths were produced by Billy. The father hid them in his hand in such a manner that only an end of each straw could be seen. Then each boy drew a straw.

"Ha, ha!" said the merry parent jovially. "Bill, you an' Buck an' Lige git the short ones."

"What does that mean?" asked the amused guest, whose look of amusement faded away when his host said:

"Mean? Why, that's a little way we hav o' settlin' which three of 'em shall sleep with any gent that happens to stop over night with us. I 'spect you'll find Buck and Bill and Lige mighty lively bedfellers, but don't you be afeerd to giv 'em a warmin' up with your boot or a bed slat if they git to trainin' too high. Go 'long, boys, an' pile in with this gent, and mind that you behave yourselvs."

The Kind She Wanted.

Katie livs in the suburbs of Boston, and her small head is not infrequently badly mixed upon things that relate to the difference between the ways of the town where she livs and the ways of Boston. She has always a great scorn, however, for having things different from city fashions, and this shows itself in the most unexpected ways.

Not long ago a traveling photographer came along and established himself not far from her father's house, and her mother decided to improve the opportunity to hav some pictures of the children taken.

"Come, Katie," she said one morning, after it had all been talked over before the child, who had made no comment whatever, "go to nurse and get on your things and come with baby and me to hav your tintypes taken."

But Katie drew back.

"No, mamma, dear." she said, gravely; "if you will excuse me, I won't hav any tintypes taken. I'll wait, if you please, till you can take me to town and get a real telegraph of me."

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Little Johnny W. is four years old, and formerly lived in Bangor. His parents now reside at Augusta. The other day Johnny's natural aptitude for fun and mischief led him to commit some trifling misdemeanor, which was promptly rebuked by his mother. She dwelt upon the fact of God's seeing us and always knowing what we are doing. The idea seemed to impress Johnny forcibly, and for several moments he remained silent. At last he broke out with: "Say, mother, does God see everything in Augusta?" "Yes," was the solemn reply. "He sees our every act." Whereupon the young sinner exclaimed: "Good gracious, mother! Let's move back to Bangor."

A little boy was the other day asked if he did not wish that a certain lady of whom he was very fond, and who had just died, could come back to see him. He thought a moment and replied: "Well, yes; if she can come just like any other lady and make a call, yes; but if she comes with her wings and cannot sit down, I think she had better stay where she is."

HE'S A BRICK.—Very few of the thousands who use the above slang term know its origin or its primitiv significance, according to which it is a grand thing to say of a man, "He's a brick." The word used in its original intent implies all that is brave, patriotic, and loyal. Plutarch, in his life of Agesilaus, king of Sparta, givs us the meaning of the quaint and familiar expression. On a certain occasion an embassador from Epirus, on a diplomatic mission, was shown by the king over his capital. The embassador knew of the monarch's fame—knew that, though nominally only king of Sparta, he was ruler of Greece—and he had looked to see massiv walls rearing aloft their embattled towers for the defense of the city, but found nothing of the kind. He marveled much at this, and spoke of it to the king. "Sire," said he, "I hav visited most of the principal towns, and I find no walls reared for defense. Why is this?" "Indeed, Sir Embassador," replied Agesilaus, "thou canst not hav looked carefully. Come with me to-morrow morning and I will show you the walls of Sparta." Accordingly, on the following morning, the king led his guest out upon the plain, where his army was drawn up in full array, and pointing proudly to the patriot host, he said: "There thou beholdest the walls of Sparta—ten thousand men, and every man a brick."

HERE are a few amusing blunders that hav just occurred in examinations in Boston public schools: One little girl said that "in 1620 the Pilgrims came to Massachusetts for the purpose of fighting the battle of Bunker Hill." Another said: "In 1682 William Penn explored Pennsylvania with a crew of Quakers." In another paper a small boy, who had evidently heard that the English people were fond of meats, said that of all the countries he had rather visit England, because he would like to see the Thames river and the beefeaters.

SHADOWS AND IDEALS. Poems. By Francis E. Saltus. Buffalo: Charles Wells Moulton. Portrait, half-leather, gilt, 364 pages. Price, $2.50.

After all the dubious and scrupulous hesitation called for in a proceeding of such hazard, we feel inclined to pronounce that here we hav before us that rare thing in the mass of current verse, a body of genuin poetry. We are willing to giv it as our belief that among Mr. Saltus's poems will be found some such as "the world will not willingly let die."

THE ETHICAL PROBLEM. By Dr. Paul Carus. Three lectures, viz., Ethics, A Science; The Data of Ethics; The Theories of Ethics. Chicago: The Open Court Publishing Co. Cloth, 90 pages. Price, 50 cents.

"The ethical problem has come into great prominence in these days," says Dr. Carus. "Chairs of ethics hav been created in our universities, and the churches are more and more urged to set aside for a while their useless disputes about dogmas and to devote themselvs to ethical work." The writer elaborates, with incidental criticisms upon points in the doctrins of Mill and Spencer, the system of ethics which he regards as the coming one. The style is perspicuous, the matter at least suggestiv and certainly elevating.

NATURAL MORALITY. Abridged for Liberal schools and classes. By Mary A. White. Paper, 58 pages. Price, 25 cents.

This is one of the first of the Moral Manuals which we expect soon to issue from the printing-press in abundant number, to supplant the present hodge-podge of religion and supposed ethics. The author says her object is the elimination of the supernatural from moral science. By giving plain and truthful definitions to natural rights and moral axioms, she hopes to relieve moral science of the confusion which has heretofore accrued from making artificial obligations, or duties to unknown deities, paramount to the obligations which men owe to one another. The matter is laid out under the heads of First Principles; Moral Obligation and Ethical Attributes; Conscience, Artificial and Natural; The Influence of Self-Esteem on Character; Natural Affection, Religious Love, Home Love; Political Ethics. To our good opinion of the book we will subjoin those of two Western friends:

"This little book, 'Natural Morality,' places every Liberal—man, woman, and child—under debt of gratitude to its author, Mrs. Mary A. White, of San Diego, Cal. It is a precious boon to all intelligent parents and guardians, and cannot fail to become the accepted text-book in every local Liberal society. It contains within its fifty-seven handsomely printed pages more of profitable instruction, founded on self-evident truth, than I hav ever found within twice the same number of pages of any other book I hav ever read. To fail to obtain a copy, and read and re-read till its facts are committed to memory, is to fail of duty to the cause of Liberalism. It will prove an invaluable aid in controversy with Christian sophists. The book is an armament of condensed dynamite. It explodes the fanatic's idea that all morality is founded on Christianity, and answers Christian sneers with keen, incisiv truth. Every child able to read should possess a copy. It needs but a glance at any one of its pages to arouse the interest of the intelligent Liberal. Send for a copy and judge how far this eulogy falls below the book's deserving. Sample copy, twenty-five cents. In cloth, by mail to any address, fifty cents. Address the Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette place, New York.

"C. B. REYNOLDS."

"I heartily indorse the high opinion of my husband as to the great merit of the little book, 'Natural Morality,' by Mrs. Mary A. White, of San Diego, Cal. It is truly a priceless gem, and I am proud that it is a woman's work. F. C. REYNOLDS."

A THOUGHTLESS YES, AND OTHER STORIES. By Helen H. Gardener. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.

This charming and thoughtful volume, by our prized contributor, Helen Gardener, finds much favor in the eyes of the critics. The New York Herald says:

"In this volume are collected a few short stories of more serious quality than many romancers attempt. The mystery and consequences of heredity is the motiv of some of the strongest; another is on the awfulness of poverty to a nature which also is affectionate and has others dependent upon it. Nearly all are forceful; nearly all are sad also. The author is not morbid; she is honestly thoughtful, but there are themes upon which thought tends toward gloom, and contemplation of individuals and conditions which are not as they should be may quite as rightly throw somber tints over a story as over essay or sermon."

Unity is of opinion as follows:

"America has perhaps twenty clever writers of stories. Helen Gardener is one of these. But she is also one of the few—we dare not say how few—who put moral earnestness and enthusiasm for humanity into their stories. Her present book is a collection of nine short stories, only the last three having any connection in plot, but all bearing some logical relation to the quotation from Ingersoll on the cover: 'The downcast eyes of timid acquiescence hav paid to impudent authority the tribute of a thoughtless yes.' We hav praised Miss Gardener's earnestness. We cannot but regret the pessimism that goes with it, for only one of her nine stories seems to do justice to that saving remnant in modern society that works to make the world better. Still we welcome her book. Even such pessimism as hers is better than the nerveless superficiality of her rivals."

The New York Tribune's judgment is this:

"The title of Helen H. Gardener's book—'A Thoughtless Yes'—does not, so far as we can discover, relate to anything in particular. The volume is really a collection of short stories, some of which hav been published in periodicals, and all of which appear to hav a semi-didactic purpose. It is, however, not to be assumed that these nine tales are in any way dull or repulsiv, as didactic stories are, unhappily, too apt to be. On the contrary, they are marked by a qusint philosophy, and shrewd and sometimes pungent reflection, and each possesses enough purely literary merit to make its way and hold its own. 'The Lady of the Club' is indeed a terrible study of social abuses and problems, and most of the others suggest more than they openly state in the same direction."

The Banner of Light, Boston, Mass., announces the reduction of its subscription price to $2 50.

"Theosophy the Religion of Jesus" is a pamphlet issued by the Theosophical Society, New York, at 2 cents.

"Is Marriage a Failure?" is a thought-awakening pamphlet issued by the Lucifer Publishing Co., Valley Falls, Kan., at 5 cents.

One of the numerous systems for improvement of the memory is set forth in "The Accretiv System of Developing Memory and Thought," by James Pierson Downs. Price, 10 cents.

Those persons who are interested in the investigations and reports of the agricultural departments of colleges, may by application receive free from the Cornell University college of agriculture its weekly bulletin.

"Three Lectures on the Science of Language and Its Place in General Education," by F. Max Müller. This work of the famous philologist is issued in the form of a cloth-bound volume of 112 pages by the Open Court Publishing Co. Price, 75 cents.

"The Blind Men and the Devil," by Phineas, and published by Lee & Shepard, Boston, is one of those romances involving the extraordinary and the fanciful which are the vogue of the day. It is clever and interesting. Paper, 219 pages. Price, 50 cents.

"The Preachers." By a Monk. Such is the designation appearing on the cover of a work which exposes and belabors the clergy not at all in the style of any monk, but in that of a thoroughgoing Freethinker. The publishers are the Minerva Publishing Co., New York. Paper, 248 pages. Price, 50 cents.

The wrongs perpetrated within the walls of insane asylums, including the incarceration of sane individuals, are laid before the public by Clarissa Caldwell Lathrop in a recital of personal experience. This is published under the title, "A Secret Institution." Bryant Publishing Co., New York. Paper, 339 pages. Price, 50 cents.

"Free Political Institutions: Their Nature, Essence, and Maintenance." This is an abridgment and rearrangement of Lysander Spooner's "Trial by Jury," executed by Victor Yarros. It is an acute examination of current methods of government and administration of justice, dealing particularly with trial by jury. Benjamin Tucker publishes the book at 25 cents.

Saladin (W. Stewart Ross), the able editor of the London Secular Review, has written "St. Mungo: the Life and Adventures of the Son of a Virgin." "In former times," the author reminds us, "children without a father, or with only a god or a ghost for a father, were comparativly common." One of these children of extra-natural generation, known as St. Mungo, is the subject of the present little biography. Readers will detect not a few reflections on that other marvelously conceived individual, Jesus Christ. The price is 25 cents.

On October 1st, the Open Court Publishing Co., of Chicago, will begin the publication of the Monist, a new quarterly magazine of philosophy, science, religion, and sociology. The first number of this new magazine will contain articles by Prof. E. D. Cope, of Philadelphia; Prof. George J. Romanes, of London; M. Alfred Binet, of Paris; Prof. Ernst Mach, of Prague; Max Dessoir, of Berlin, and Dr. Paul Carus, of Chicago. Articles will appear in the Monist by Prof. Joseph Le Conte, Prof. William James, Charles S. Pierce, Prof. Max Muller, Prof. Ernst Hæckel, and Th. Ribot.

Nos. 130 and 131 of the Humboldt Library of Science present, in two parts, the valuable work of Dr. Isaac Taylor, "The Origin of the Aryans." The first part of the book handles the Prehistoric Races of Europe, and presents much matter of interest on the struggles and toils of our early ancestors in the far and dim past. The life of these people is treated under the heads, among others: "The Continuity of Development, Metals, Weapons, Cattle, Husbandry, Food, Dress, Habitations, The Boat, The Ox-Wagon, Trades, Social Life, Relativ Progress." Next the Aryan race is particularly considered, with its language, its mythology, etc. No. 133 of this Library is Part I of "The Evolution of Sex," by Prof. Patrick Geddes and J. Arthur Thomson. The above are all double numbers, selling at 30 cents.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indescretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT. "Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address, Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second, that he fulfills all his agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would have been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

News of the Week.

CHICAGO accuses New York of playing "a vile game" by trying to poison the European mind against the World's Fair.

A SUDDEN death at Albion, N. Y., last Sunday, was not that of a blaspheming Atheist but of Rev. George Cain, who fell dead in the middle of a sentence of his sermon.

ANOTHER electric light lineman was killed at New York on the 15th while at work up the poles.

THE Brazil elections are in progress, and the republican party is obtaining victory over the clericals and imperialists.

BOSTON Catholics and Protestants still fight over history in schools. A board has been appointed to hear parents' complaints.

UPON the strike of two hundred carpenters at Spokane Falls, Wash., their places were at once taken by indignant millionaires, bankers, merchants, etc.

THE New York Y. M. C. A. on Sunday the 14th listened to Rev. Thomas Dixon, who counseled government prohibition of strikes, with military enforcement.

THE police authorities of New York city will take a new census, and demand that the national census board accept it or make a recount. Many other cities ask recounts.

THERE are threats of violence at Richmond, Ky., if Schweinfurth attempts to start a colony there, as announced. A church there has expelled several members for believing in his divinity.

THREE Knights of Labor are said to hav confessed that they with two others made the attempt to wreck a New York Central train. Most Knights call the confession a "put-up job" of the company.

COMPLAINT is made of New York's backwardness in the institution of public libraries, in which line she is surpassed by the most inconsiderable cities of England. The cause is Catholic Tammany rule.

THE mendacity of journalism is illustrated by the communication to the press by a correspondent in Montreal of a falsehood representing Prince George as being engaged in a street fight in that city. The reporter will be prosecuted.

JAMES BAILY, a Birmingham, Ala., voodoo doctor, who represents himself as the high priest of the queen of heaven, has been arrested for swindling his dupes, but says the queen of heaven will speedily punish all who dare harm her high priest.

RAILROAD trainmen ask that automatic coupling and power brakes be adopted on freight and all trains, saying that now their life is more dangerous than that of soldiers in a war. In one year, they say, 20,000 trainmen hav been injured and 2,700 killed.

THE chief railroad accidents of the week were a collision on the Reading, Pa., road on the 19th, by which a crowded express was thrown in the Schuylkill river and thirty or forty were killed and many injured; and a collision at Chicago on the 21st by which fifteen were killed.

AT Berlin Max Goerish, a half-witted fellow, was made frantic by Salvation Army meetings, and believed himself sent by heaven to clear the world of sinners. Meeting Emil Rohnbeck, a butcher, he shot him, exclaiming, "Thus do I avenge the Lord!" Then he shot himself.

A REPORT states that the Mormon settlers in the Canadian northwest are very thrifty. One of the main complaints of the outsiders is that "they never spend a cent over a bar." They say that while they regard polygamy as scriptural, they do not practice it in this country and do not intend to.

THE Catholics of the Roman Catholic Canadian province of Quebec complain that the Protestant province of Ontario "has the monopoly of licensed rowdyism." The natives of Ontario speak in the same strain of Quebec, and protest against frequent attacks on Protestant persons and property. In Catholic Montreal the Orangemen, who hav not dared to parade on July 12th for several years, announce that they will do so next year, and the Catholics unblushingly avow their intention to make trouble for them.

Gems of Thought.

WE may acquiesce in the pleasing conclusion that every age of the world has increased, and still increases, the real wealth, the happiness, the knowledge, and perhaps the virtue, of the human race.—Gibbon.

THE condition of man, compared with what it has been, is easy and just.—Guizot.

WHENEVER the doctrin of exclusiv salvation is generally believed and realized, habits of thought will be formed around it that are diametrically opposed to the spirit of inquiry and absolutely incompatible with human progress. An indifference to truth, a spirit of blind and at the same time willful credulity, will be encouraged, which will multiply fictions of every kind, will associate inquiry with the ideas of danger and of guilt, will make men esteem that impartiality of judgment and study which is the very soul of truth, an unholy thing, and will so emasculate their faculties as to produce a general torpor on every subject.—Lecky.

IT has been the business of the church for centuries to extinguish the lamp of the mind, and to convince the people that their own reason is utterly unreliable.—Ingersoll.

THE books of every theological system narrate acts of the grossest cruelty, which are, without hesitation, ascribed to the direct interposition of God.—Buckle.

ACCORDING to the Bible, this good God believed in religious persecution; this good God believed in extermination, in polygamy, in concubinage, in human slavery; this good God commanded murder and massacre, and this good God could only be mollified by the shedding of blood. This good God wanted a butcher for a priest. This good God wanted husbands to kill their wives—wanted fathers and mothers to kill their children. This good God persecuted animals on account of the crimes of their owners. This good God killed the common people because the king had displeased him. This good God killed the babe even of the maid behind the mill, in order that he might get even with a king. This good God committed every possible crime. . . . If God did what the Bible says he did, then I insist that God is not good.—Ingersoll.

ULTRA-SKEPTICISM.

THIS life we liv is a strange dream, and I don't believe at all any account men giv of it.—Thoreau.

SKEPTICISM, in philosophy, is the doctrin which sets up, as its highest principle, doubt or suspense of judgment in view of the contradictory nature of phenomena. It infers the impossibility of knowing truth. The ancient skepticism is directed against sense-perception. Ænesidemus collected Pyrrho's arguments, as follows: Knowledge of truth is uncertain, because of the difference (1) in the organization in animals resulting in different modes of knowledge (how can we decide?); (2) in the human constitution in tastes, feelings, desires, capacities, etc.; (3) in the structure of the organs of sense, the same object being white to the eye, sweet to the taste, rough to the touch, etc.; (4) in the mental and physical condition at different times; (5) in the position, distances, and intervals of objects; (6) in the appearance of objects by reason of their complication with each other; (7) in the appearance of objects owing to their variation in quantity, size of parts, etc.; (8) in objects on account of the general relativity of things known; (9) in the frequency with which objects are observed; (10) in regard to education, all customs, habits, laws, ideas, faith, and theories being derived from it. Agrippa reduced the tropes to five: (1) the discordance of opinions renders all uncertain; (2) every proof rests upon grounds which again need proof, and so ad infinitum; (3) all our ideas are relativ; (4) all systems rest upon hypotheses; (5) the vicious circle, demonstrating the grounds on which the proof rests by that which is proved by them. Sextus Empiricus has left us a complete account of ancient skepticism, and himself sums up the whole as follows: Nothing is certain in itself, as is proved by the diversity of opinion, and nothing can be made certain by proof, since it derives no certainty from itself, and if based on other proof, leads us either to the regressus ad infinitum or to a vicious circle.—Professor Harris.

THE SPECTER THAT THREATENS THE IRISH.

Notes and Clippings.

"THE truth is," says the Catholic Monitor, "that the Chinese take all the Bibles they can get, then quietly cut off the covers and use the leaves for padding the soles of Chinese shoes, and for other more ignoble purposes."

A STEAMER that sailed for the Congo region from a Belgian port the other day contained ten thousand casks of rum. Belgium is employing such means to Christianize the heathen as were used many years ago by New England.

THE Churchman, of this city, closes a careful review of the debate upon the bill to enlarge the appropriation for the Roman Catholic bureau of education, by calling on all Protestant societies receiving government aid, to purge themselvs in this matter by refusing any longer to participate, and says: "As it is to-day, by reason of participation, eyes are blinded and lips are dumb in the presence of wrong, and a department of the national government made subservient to the Roman hierarchy." But who expects the Protestant societies to follow the Churchman's advice!

THE Ping King Tong Society and the Chee Kong Tong Society are two religious Chinese organizations existing in that part of San Francisco which is called Chinatown. Last Sunday morning the Ping King Tongs were conducting open-air worship, when they were attacked by the Chee Kong Tongs, who extinguished their sacred fires and disturbed their meeting generally. A fight ensued, revolvers and knives were drawn, clubs swung, and shots fired, so that except for their color and dress the contending parties, says Freethought, of that city, could scarcely hav been distinguished from two opposing Christian sects settling a religious dispute.

WHEN Deacon Hotchkiss bought Brother Bemis's yearling heifer, he demanded a guarantee of the animal's condition, and he asked Brother Bemis to swear to that guarantee before the justice of peace. Brother Bemis, alleges Puck, was hurt by this unusual precaution on the part of a lifelong friend and neighbor. "Why, Brother Hotchkiss," he remonstrated, "you ain't no need to be so pesky s'picious with me. I ain't never cheated you, hev I? You wa'n't like this before." "I wa'n't—I wa'n't," assented Brother Hotchkiss, cordially, "but I hearn you t' other night when you wuz on th' anxious seat at revival meetin', and I sez to myself, sez I, 'if Brother Bemis is haff the sinner he makes himself out to be, it behooves me to be everlastin' keerful with him next caow-trade.'"

THE Brooklyn Eagle says: "Mayor Chapin parted company with the instincts of his Democracy, with the principles of Thomas Jefferson, with the guarantees of the Constitution, and with those natural rights which are older and stronger than even constitutions themselvs, when he said that a meeting should not be held because he feared the law would be violated by something which might be said there, instead of determining that the meeting could be held and would be permitted to go on until something was said or done calling for the interference of the officers of the law, in which case the police could easily hav cleared the fellows out. The mayor has made a very serious mistake. The way for him to recover from it is to acknowledge it, to say that he erred, to admit that he acted hastily, and to promis that he will not do so any more."

FOR nearly two years the question of excluding from the roll of public school teachers married women living with their husbands has been agitated in the school board of Cincinnati. A month ago a resolution declaring the places of such teachers vacant was adopted. The superintendent was authorized to fill the vacancies. This he did by reappointing the discharged women. The question came up at Monday's meeting on approving his action, which, after a heated debate, was done by a vote of seventeen to eleven. One side has held that the retention of married women who ought to be supported by their husbands, has kept out ambitious graduates of the normal school. The other side argued the competency of the teachers, and held that the fact that they were living with their husbands was a guarantee of good character and ability to direct the young.

PROFESSOR BRIGGS of the Presbyterian Theological Seminary in this city is an advocate of revision of the Westminster Confession, a believer in "second probation," and Elliott Fireawaywithhismouth Shepard demands his resignation in consequence thereof. Commenting thereon the Sun says: "The sympathy of the great mass of Presbyterians in New York is with Professor Briggs, and they will not consent to his injury at the hands of so emotional a person. His Presbyterianism is the Presbyterianism that suits them, not the old-fashioned Calvinism of the vociferous colonel. Undoubtedly, Professor Briggs is teaching new and strange doctrins. Undoubtedly, he is undermining the old orthodox belief. But that is what makes him so popular among Presbyterians and theological students. They themselvs hav discarded orthodoxy, and they hail him as their champion. If he is on the straight road to Agnosticism, so also are they traveling to the same goal, and they rejoice in such a leader. Colonel Shepard cannot hurt Professor Briggs."

THE Fremont Tribune says that a good story has leaked out on one of the ministers who took a very activ part in the redemption of sinners at the late Fremont camp-meeting. It is said that at one of the meetings the customary invitation was given for all who wanted to go to heaven to rise up. All present rose to their feet with the exception of one young man who sat back pretty well on the outskirts of the audience. Those who desired to go to heaven sat down. Then all those who wanted to go to hell were requested to rise to their feet, and the aforesaid young man was eyed with a great deal of interest. Still he sat as quiet and composed as a stone. The minister went to him and asked him why he did not rise in either instance. "Wall," replied the husky son of toil, "I don't want ter go anywhar. Fremont's good ernuff fer me." And the preacher wended his way back to the altar, and sitting down on the mourners' bench leaned over and tied his shoe.

Communications.

Hundreds of Christians hav helped to pay, and hav received, bounties for killing panthers, bears, wolves, foxes, and other destructiv and dangerous animals which hav infested the country. And in many states men are compelled, by law, to destroy noxious weeds.

Now, if the Christian really believed these things to be given by a good God for a wise purpose, would he kill and destroy them? Here, as in other instances, his practice belies his profession.

The Christian profession, so contrary to practice, makes men liv out a lie, and shows them to be a class of devil-dodgers who are willing to sacrifice their manhood in this world for an imaginary crown in the next.

Would the Rev. Herbert Morris spare a tarantula which got up the leg of his pants because he believed it to be a blessing not understood, sent by a wise and good God? I think a big sturdy tarantula would make the reverend gentleman shout, but it would not be in exaltation of the goodness of God.

Would not anyone hav prevented the tornado in the West which leveled a whole village to the earth, if he had the power to do so? Every Christian who lost home and friends is forced to say that "God sent the tornado—God is good," therefore the tornado was a blessing not understood. The truth is, Christians regard these calamities just as Infidels do, and when they pretend anything else they lie.

When the morning papers brought news of the Western tornado I asked a pious snob who was laying down flooring if he believed that God sent it. He said he did. I then asked him if he thought it all for the best to hav property destroyed, people killed, and wives and children made homeless. His brow knit, a cloud seemed to pass over his mind, and with an air of reproach he said, "To ask such questions is to tempt God. It is ours to patiently submit to whatever God sends, and to hav faith to believe that everything is ruled for our good."

Just then he struck his thumb a full blow with the hammer. The blood started from under the nail, and he danced in frenzy of pain. I really pitied the poor man, but I could not lose my opportunity. Does God rule everything for our good? I asked. It must hav afforded God a great deal of pleasure if any good end was accomplished by that painful accident, for I am sure it has done nobody any good. Notwithstanding his profession, it was plain enough to see that he had no desire for another such display of God's goodness.

Notwithstanding all the Christians say and profess, all things are not good. Many things are bad without a mitigating circumstance. Nobody courts the visitation of a tornado or an earthquake. Who would not exterminate the ferocious beasts, the poisonous insects, or noxious weeds? Nobody has ever found any good in them and never will. They hav filled us with fear and dread, and vexed and tormented us in various ways, without doing any good to anybody.

In this world there seems to be a mixture of good and evil. There is no class of men or animals entirely free from suffering. There is hunger, thirst, sorrow, and disease, and ultimately death for all. From this condition of things it must follow, either that God does not direct all the affairs of this world, or that he is not entirely good.

The truth is, we liv in a world governed by inexorable laws, which yield not to prayers or entreaties. And instead of studying those laws so as to put ourselvs in harmony with them, so as to avoid many troubles and dangers to which we are exposed, the minds of men hav been diverted by designing ecclesiastics to gods and myths which they can never know anything about, and which can never do any good.

To say that it is good to be stung and bitten by insects and reptils, or chewed up by a tiger, or crushed in the folds of a constrictor, and that all would so understand it if they could see through all of God's plans—to use plain language, is to lie for God's sake. But from the cradle to the grave Christians are lied to in regard to these matters, and they seem to act as if they could serve God by lying to everybody else.

If Christians believed what they teach there is not one of them that would kill a rattlesnake or dispatch a scorpion. For they are creatures of God's creation, and "his goodness and mercy are over all his works, and he doeth all things well." But half the acts of the Christian giv the lie to what he says. He professes love for all mankind—but there is nothing to be dreaded more than the hate of a Christian. He professes to do unto others as he would hav others do unto him. Yet he wants the privilege of speaking his sentiments, and would send others first to prison and then to hell for exercising the same privilege. He professes to believe that the old patriarchs were special favorits of God, yet fights the Mormons for practices which most distinguished them.

Thus the Christian religion, instead of inducing men to liv good and useful lives, prompts them to practice all manner of deceit and acts of hypocrisy, and to assert as a fact what every sane man must know has no foundation in truth.

It would tap the jugular of a Christian to tell him that God is not kind, merciful, and good. But the most cursory survey of the animal and vegetable kingdom ought to satisfy every thinking man that his mercy is not "over all his works" and that he is not altogether good and kind.

Was it a good and merciful arrangement to so constitute the animal kingdom that one half should be the natural food for the other half?

If we take into consideration all the meat-eating and insect-devouring animals it will be found that this statement is not far from the truth.

The eagle livs to be a hundred years old and is one of the most ferocious animals in the world. It preys principally upon those which are most innocent and helpless. The fawn, the lamb, the rabbit, and helpless birds and fish are its constant food. Every time the hunger of an eagle is appeased, for a hundred years, some animal must die. If it cannot find the prey it must itself die. If one could see all the animals gathered together that an eagle kills during its lifetime, would he say that it was a merciful arrangement to sacrifice the lives of so many animals in order to sustain the life of a savage and useless bird? The same is true to a greater or less extent of all the birds of prey.

The same argument holds true of the whole feline family. Every time the stomach of a lion or tiger or panther is filled some animal must be sacrificed. They can liv in no other way. The cries of their captured victims and their struggles to escape no doubt produce pleasing sensations to them.

There are many birds which are not considered birds of prey which subsist entirely upon animal food found in the air, in the earth, on its surface, or on the water. What is true of animals on land is equally true of animals in water. It is said by some naturalist that the right whale subsists entirely upon small insects. If this be true, who shall compute the millions of lives which will be taken during the life of a whale, which is from five hundred to a thousand years?

The Rev. Mr. Morris tells of a fish which was caught which had swallowed a cod two feet long. In the cod was another fish, and in that still another.

Entomologists tell us that many kinds of insects prey upon each other and are the most voracious animals in the world. Some insects are left in a deplorable condition. If they fly in the air a bird takes them from above. If they fall into the water, a fish takes them from below. Now, does this wholesale destruction, which has been going on for thousands of years, and must continue for thousands of years to come, show forth the goodness and mercy of God? Could not God do any better than to make the life of one animal depend upon taking the life of another?

First the cod caught the young of the big fish that afterward swallowed it. A bird breaks and devours the eggs of the eagle and then the eagle catches the bird. If the Christian can see goodness and mercy in such an arrangement, then he can see goodness and mercy where there is only war, robbery, ferocity, and cruelty.

The Rev. Mr. Morris says that a pike has been known to liv two hundred and sixty-seven years. God so fashioned a pike that it can only liv by taking the lives of other animals. Now, if all the fish and other animals which that pike devoured for nearly three hundred years could be collected together, what a pile of God's goodness and mercy the Christian would hav to exhibit.

The great harmonizer says in regard to these ferocious animals that "God has not made them very numerous." Thus he admits that God is savage, but in extenuation claims that he is savage only to a limited degree. This is the fair interpretation of his meaning.

To sum up the whole matter, in the human family as well as in the animal kingdom, the weak are overpowered by the strong, and all of this palaver about the goodness and mercy of God is mere Christian bosh.

In noxious weeds and plants we hav another display of God's goodness and mercy. There are many kinds of weeds and plants which poison men and cattle and other useful animals, which hav never done any good, the seeds of which will germinate under the most unfavorable circumstances, and hundreds of years after they hav been produced. And some of these weeds multiply at such a rate that they would cover the whole earth in a few years if allowed to spread.

And it would appear in many cases that the more harmful and troublesome a plant is, the greater facility this benevolent God has furnished for the distribution of the seed. There are many hooked and bearded seeds which fasten to almost everything which comes in contact with them, and are carried miles away. Some winged and feathered seeds are carried leagues away in the wind.

It is true that mice and birds and other animals may distribute the useful grains to some extent, but in the main they fall where they grow. And then the soil must be prepared and the grains and useful plants carefully attended to produce a dozen fold.

And it will hold true that destructiv insects prey upon the useful grains and plants more than they do upon noxious weeds. And such is the arrangement of a good and merciful God who looks upon his children with a care unknown to any earthly parent. Without any preparation of the soil, the burdock will flourish and reproduce its kind a hundred fold, while the worms will eat the young corn and the weevil will destroy the wheat. Thus it would appear that this loving, tender, merciful God, who is so much interested in the welfare of man that he numbers the hairs of his head, is more interested in the growth of a burdock than he is in a hill of corn.

After showing from the beginning that God arranged everything for the accommodation of the coming occupant, and that he planned everything for his, man's, good and welfare, and that benevolence and goodness and mercy characterized every design, the great harmonizer manipulates the rubber in this wise:

> Its history [the race's] has been, for the most part, a history of tyranny, slavery, lust, carnage, and devastation in every region of the globe. The bulk of mankind hav been nothing more than a crowd of wretches equally criminal and unfortunate. Toil, disappointment, disease, and sorrow constitute the lot of man in his most favorable circumstances.

Does it not beat all into how many grotesque and contradictory shapes the Christian's india-rubber God can be squeezed? If the Rev. Herbert Morris could only hav remembered that he had admitted many, many times that even the most trivial affairs cannot take place without God's consent, that not a sparrow can fall without his permission, and that he has designed everything in mercy and for man's good, he would not make his God blow hot and cold at the same breath.

It is no surprise that ordinary Christians, educated to know nothing but Christ and him crucified, should hav a God both cruel and merciful, but for a harmonizer and expounder like the great Rev. Herbert W. Morris, A.M., to shrink and stretch, contract and expand the rubber in the manner he does, shows that the Christian religion disqualifies a man for systematic thought or makes him dishonest.

What business has an all-powerful and all-wise God to allow such suffering, cruelty, tyranny, and scenes of carnage as are above discovered to take place? How does this cruelty and suffering and savagery comport with the idea of the benevolent designs of a good and merciful God, who had power to arrange everything according to his will? Such a blundering God could not be trusted to pilot a flatboat down the Mississippi.

The following is an extract from a letter of a sewing-woman of the East to a sister in the West: "I am dying of destitution. My children are starving, husband dead—ceaseless toil that takes all my strength, and that for a mere sustenance of life. It has blighted every hope of the future. Oh, sister, is God dead? Has humanity left the earth? This life is too long for the misery that is in it. Why am I kept alive with all my joy blotted out? Why the innocent doomed to this lingering death? But for them I would kill myself. Sixteen hours a day to keep this miserable life. I die of want."

Is this the best that God can do? From the beginning God knew how this woman would suffer. Could he make no better arrangement? If he could not, he lacked the power; if he would not, he is a savage.

Then the editor who relates this pitiful tale says: "No, sister, God is not dead. The attention of ministers will be called to your case."

And what will the minister do—giv her food and clothing? No. He will pour the wine of consolation into her bleeding heart by telling her that the blood of the savior cleanses from all sin and wipes the tears from off all faces.

It is said that when the papers of Arnold were put into Washington's hand, he swore terribly. Even the humble may imitate the great in some things, and I say damn a theology which turns the attention of men from such scenes of suffering to a heaven which never can be reached, and to a God whom they can do no good, and who never can benefit them.

Years ago, before there was any law regulating the factory system, women were beaten and insulted by brutal overseers, and children of tender age were worked twelve to fifteen hours per day. One little girl in the state of New Jersey had her leg broken by one of the inhuman bosses with a billet of wood. What was God about while these cruelties were being practiced? Was he attending to the sparrows or numbering the hairs of our heads, or was he listening to the music of heavenly harps played by those who hav been "jerked to Jesus?"

That God has ever had anything to do with the actions of men remains yet to be proved.

Aristocracy in Religion.

I liv in the heart of the large and populous Kansas City. One pleasant afternoon, as I was seated at my desk busily engaged in writing, a colored woman rushed in abruptly, asking, "Do you know of any minister near by?" Without waiting for an answer, she continued, "I am nursing a lady in there, who is dying," pointing to a well-known house of ill-fame, albeit a third-class, shackled old structure, owned by a wealthy church-member, "and she wants a minister to sing and pray." When I told her I did not know the address of any, she looked rather incredulous, and added, "You go to church, don't you?" I said, "Sometimes," but I really did not know the residence of any of the pastors.

She went away, and I went on with my writing, not giving it much thought, as I hav very little faith in the efficacy of ministers. I am accustomed to being applied to by the unfortunate; but this was a new phase, to go to a notorious Freethinker for a minister.

When I had finished my writing, it occurred to my mind that, belonging to the class she did, she might hav difficulty in getting anyone interested to procure a minister. I resolved to ascertain, and if she had not, I would take some activ steps to procure one. Not only that the woman's dying wish might be gratified, but, I must confess, I feel a sort of glee in driving the good folks to work among the lowly, as I hav good reason to think they are not anxious for such jobs. So I put on my hat and went over the way, and learned she had no minister and very much wished me to send one. Just then a good Methodist friend of mine came around the corner, and I accosted him, telling him what was wanted and where. He said he did not know of any near by—showed a good deal of emotion, and said, "By all means, she ought to hav a minister." I said I would keep on up the street and perhaps find one, as a tall church spire reared its head less than two blocks distant. He said, "There are no churches up that way." I pointed to the spire, and asked, "What is that?" He very contemptuously answered, "Oh, that is Presbyterian." Evidently, in his mind, there was no church worth applying to except the Methodist.

I must say my heart failed me about going into that aristocratic Presbyterian building, so I dropped into a painter's shop, a Liberal friend of mine, who I thought might be able to giv me information. He was practical and to the point. He said, "Go over to the corner to the undertaker's—the two kinds of business run together—and he can telephone for a minister quickly—might officiate himself—ought to be able to. He will get the job, probably [meaning funeral arrangements], and it is no harm to bother him a little." So I directed my steps to the undertaker's, and made known my errand. He was very sanctimonious, but he "did not know of any." He is a good Methodist, but he did not suggest his own pastor. At length a bright idea seemed to strike him, and he said, "Go to the Young Men's Christian Association. Young men are there ready to go at all times and to all kinds of cases." Presumably he thought this was a case that would do for a "prentice hand." So I asked him to telephone there, and he did so.

As I came away, I again met my Methodist friend, who inquired about my success, and remarked, "You might hav got one of the Salvation Army; it would hav been good enough for such as her."

A young man from the Young Men's Christian Association came and prayed with her, but as "it is the unexpected that generally happens" she did not die. He left his card, saying "if she needed him again she would know where to send!"

Inference: If she livs she would not need him, but if she makes a success of dying, she would need him.

Query: If a wealthy man had been reported as dying, or even had the lady been an inmate of an imposing and richly furnished bagnio, would I hav had to run about as I did to find a minister?

No Fancy Sketch.

My early intercourse in life with theologians begot a fixed irreverence for all clerical assumption, so much so that I hav ever since avoided much intercourse with them.

It so occurred at one time I was in attendance at the couch of a young girl who was far gone with consumption. Sarah W. was a thoughtful, sensible girl while in health, and quite philosophic in sickness. A lady friend who had called upon her with some delicacies befitting her condition, formed a sympathetic trio, but which was broken by the addition of her former pastor, the Rev. Mr. R——. He had not seen Sarah for many months, and expressed much sympathy for her low condition of health.

"Ah, Sarah," he remarked, "our Sunday-school misses your attention much. But alas, sickness will unavoidably at times intercept our best intentions."

"True," remarked Sarah; "but it is not physical ailment alone that has made me a stranger. I hav been looking into the philosophy of Spiritualism."

The reverend gentleman looked around him in awful silence and solemnly remarked, "Sarah, Sarah, you are in a dangerous way, a very dangerous way!" and slowly glanced around in apparent horror. Catching the personage of Mrs. P——, he inquired to what church she belonged. In reply Mrs. P—— said she belonged to no church and was in fact a Spiritualist. Closing his eyes, he muttered in an undertone, "Sad, sad, sad."

Mrs. P——, feeling a privilege to speak, said Spiritualism at least had relieved her from all theological restraint and she felt free to listen to all lectures tending to Liberalize the mind, scientific, Atheistic, or Agnostic.

"Yes, yes," the reverend gentleman interrupted, smiling sarcastically, "where perhaps your flowing ringlets might be more attractiv."

I must confess I felt a sudden shock of boldness at this clerical barbarity. But I restrained utterance, and, calmly as I could, only remarked, "Mr. R——, from whence do you obtain authority to catechise and pass strictures upon strangers perhaps you hav never before seen?"

He looked me steadily in the face, and drawing a small Bible from his vest pocket and tapping it affectionately, said: "This little book, the holy Bible, which I am almost certain, aged as you seem, you seldom read."

"Read," I reiterated with some warmth, "read! do you know, sir, I hav read the Bible twice through, perhaps before you were born! Read! know, sir, I was 'copy boy' of the first Bible stereotyped for the New York Bible Society, in the year 1816."

The reverend gentleman slowly and mutely returned the book to his vest pocket, and was evidently cowed. I think here I should hav stopped, but my "dander was up," so to speak, and I continued: "Mr. R——, the Bible is a big book; but, sir, can you show me a single hero or sage between its covers whose character you would place before your children as a model?"

The reverend gentleman looked down and paused a few moments, and then, on rousing, said, "Well, there is our Lord and savior, Jesus Christ!"

"What?" I said, "he a model—a frequenter of groggeries and an associate of lewd and abandoned females; one who now would be rated as a tramp or vagrant—he a model? One who at best was rated as a crazy fanatic; one who boasted of his mendicity—that he had no place to lay his head; raised a rebellion in Jerusalem by riding on an ass, and proclaimed himself king of the Jews; who——"

But here I recollected myself as I saw the reverend gentleman looking downward and silent, and thought myself out of place; hence, bowing to the sick girl, I quietly withdrew.

I was uneasy until I called upon Sarah the next day to apologize for my harsh boldness to her former pastor. She said any apology was unnecessary, she was so glad I was there. That Mr. R—— was, as an orthodox preacher, sincere and honest; but as a man he was inflexible and cold as an icicle. I inquired if any remarks took place on what I had said. She remarked, "None whatever. After a few minutes' silence he said, 'Sarah, child, may I pray for you?' 'If it will be any relief to you, Mr. R——, you may,' I replied; 'but I tell you candidly it will do me no benefit, inasmuch as I am aware of my future condition, as I hope soon to be with my foregone relations and friends. To-morrow, perhaps, you may see my mute, emaciated form before you, but you will not see your Sarah. She will be realizing her warmest expectations."

It eventuated as she predicted; three days thereafter I attended her funeral.

Random Notes.

The question of "closer organization and coöperation" is at present uppermost in the minds of Liberals. It is being given consideration in a spirit and with a vim that signifies victory for the Secularist hosts. There is no doubt in my mind that the coming year will find Liberals organized as they hav never been before. The signs of the times indicate it.

The tendency of Liberal bodies is to get together under one banner, that is to say, unite with the American Secular Union. And the Union, in my opinion, will be improved in several ways. This must come of necessity in order to bring to her fold, together under her wing, as it were, the "chicks of the entire hennery." Then what a crowing and a cackling there will be!

The coming Congress promises to be the grandest, the mightiest, and the best annual gathering ever held by American Secularists. At it will meet the true leaders, the true patriots of our country. There thinkers will do a work that will bring about the result anticipated above. The handwriting is on the wall, and it reads, "The Congress is the place to do the work, and there it will be done."

As Jamieson says, "there should be an auxiliary in every town and hamlet." That's correct. So let us be up and doing. Let us begin by making our national order stronger. Let us fall in line under the one emblem and on the one platform. Let us do our fighting shoulder to shoulder. Let us establish a mutual aid society. Let us inaugurate the lecture course system. Let us be as true and liberal to our worthy president as our enemies are to their brainless and stupid leaders. In this way, and in no other, can we win.

Did it ever occur to you that there was a time in this country when the churches were poor? When they were almost on the verge of taking up the march over the hill? How did they change? How did they face about? I will tell you. Their preachers traveled the circuit, over rugged hills, through dreary forests and tangled swamps. They did this, I might say, free, gratis. They preached for a bare living and in that way made possible the high salaries of our day and time. The question arises and stares us in the face, "Will Liberal lecturers do the same?" Will they tour the country the coming year at lower rates than heretofore? Will they for once travel under the guidance of the American Secular Union, and at living and not gilt-edged prices? Will they do this for one "three hundred and sixty-five days?" If all lecturers would agree to take the rounds at a salary sufficient to keep the wolf from the door, and carry on a brisk campaign for a period of one year, they would at the end of that time hav so organized Liberals that a larger salary would be forthcoming and with it a surplus in the treasury of the American Secular Union. Yes, by all means work under the Union's management, and for prices to suit the times. Be as magnanimous and sincere as were the preachers of fifty and a hundred years ago.

Every auxiliary should see to it that their meeting hall is decorated with the photographs of leading Freethinkers; in fact, there should be two divisions, one for the portraits of the dead and another for those of the living. Now, we hav a large surface covered with plush, the pictures set in this, and flagging encircling the whole in the shape of a deep frame. Another thing we intend to do is this: Hav our local lecturers visit the different churches, take notes of the sermon delivered, and then create a stir by announcing "that Rev. So and So will be answered in the Secular meeting hall next Sunday evening." Here we hav the papers on our side. This is rare, you know. I hav noticed all along that there is general complaint among Liberals as to the refusal of papers to print their articles. The trouble is, these Freethinkers who complain are too hasty; they find fault with the editors too quickly. If refused once they should kindly and politely receive the same, and, after a while, try again. By treating a journalist kindly you will lose nothing, but gain much. By and by you will win him to your side. We hav been mild with the reporters and editors, and, as a result, they are with us.

Christian Love Among the Mexicans.

The Christian sects love each other now as much as they ever did. S. W. Siberts writes to the Christian Advocate from Mexico: "Sixty-six Protestants hav given their lives for their faith since Protestantism entered Mexico, about twenty-five years ago. During the last few weeks two murderous attacks hav been made upon the Protestants by their Roman Catholic neighbors. In our own mission the members of a small congregation near Puebla were assaulted about midnight on April 28th, and aroused from their sleep to find a mob of Romanists setting fire to their houses and shooting into their humble homes with rifles and pistols. Some were injured, but providentially no one was killed. On April 27th a mob of about four hundred fanatics, headed by Anselmo Chanez, a Roman Catholic priest, attacked a Presbyterian congregation in El Carro, near Zecatecas. Some of the Protestants' houses were destroyed; the church was completely ruined; the organ, hymn-books, Bible, and everything else inside the church was destroyed. Three Protestants were killed and eight others severely injured. It is well known that the priest Chanez was the leader of the mob. He, with about forty of the rioters, are in prison, and the government will doubtless punish them as they deserve."

Christian Wars.

Prof. Leoni Levi, the statistician, has calculated that since the commencement of the Christian era there hav been 286 great wars in which Christian countries hav engaged. Classified as to causes they are as follows:

44 wars of ambition, to obtain extension of country.
22 wars of plunder, tribute, etc.
24 wars of retaliation or revenge.
8 wars to settle questions of honor or prerogativ.
6 wars arising from disputed claims to some territory.
41 wars arising from disputed titles to crowns.
30 wars commenced under pretense of assisting an ally.
23 wars originating in jealousy of rival greatness.
5 wars which hav grown out of commerce.
55 civil wars.
28 wars on account of religion.

Fourteenth Annual Congress.

The Fourteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union has been appointed by the board of directors to meet at Portsmouth, O., on Friday evening, October 31, 1890, and to continue its sessions on the Saturday and Sunday following.

The meetings will be held in the Grand Opera House, corner of Sixth and Court streets, and the orchestra of the establishment has been engaged for the occasion. Due notice will be given of the proposed reduction in railroad, steamboat, and hotel fares.

Portsmouth is situated on the Ohio river, one hundred miles east of Cincinnati, and one hundred miles south of Columbus, and has extensiv and convenient railway connections with the whole country. It is a port of foreign entry, and is distinguished for its numerous and magnificent manufactories. It has a population exceeding fifteen thousand, has twenty churches, the Ohio Military Academy, and a splendid system of graded schools. The Ohio valley fair is held there annually; and several English and German papers, daily and weekly, are published in the city.

The members and friends of the American Secular Union are sure of a hearty welcome, not only from our enterprising local auxiliary, but also from the citizens at large.

The object of the American Secular Union, as is well known, is to secure the total separation of church and state in fact and in form, to the end that equal rights in religion, genuin morality in politics, and freedom, virtue, and brotherhood be established, protected, and perpetuated. While we unite on what is commonly known as the Nine Demands of Secularism, we propose to emphasize the following at the coming Congress:

1. The equitable taxation of church property in common with other property.

2. The total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools, and especially the reading of any Bible.

3. The repeal and prevention of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons.

4 The cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character.

The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both religion and politics, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but heartily welcomes all persons, of whatever faith, to its membership, on the basis of "no union of church and state." The word "secular" is here used in the broadest sense, as applied to the state, and not to any system of religion or philosophy.

To discuss these questions in an orderly and friendly manner, and to devise ways and means to promote these objects, let us come together at this Congress as Freethinkers, Spiritualists, Unitarians, Universalists, Free Religionists, Quakers, progressiv Jews, and liberal Christians, and, laying aside our peculiar views on religious questions, unite as American citizens on the one broad platform of no union of church and state, and the complete administration of our secular government on purely secular principles.

The National Reform Association, having for its object the establishment of Christianity as the religion of the state by constitutional enactment; the American Sabbath Union, working for the enforcement, by legislation, of the Jewish and puritanic Sabbath on our free citizens; the Women's Christian Temperance Union, indorsing the platform and policy of both these organizations; the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, insisting through their ecclesiastical bodies upon the complete exemption of church property from just taxation, as well as the appropriation of public money for religious schools and other sectarian institutions; all these, and many others which might be mentioned, are imperiling our constitutional liberties. Every true Liberal and patriot, whether man or woman, should feel called upon to aid in organizing an effectiv opposition to these nefarious schemes.

Due notice will be given of the selection of eminent speakers from all portions of the United States and Canada, and a free platform will be given to all persons who may hav a word to say for pure state secularization. All, without exception, are welcome to this Congress in the wide-awake little city in the valley of the beautiful Ohio.

R. B. WESTBROOK, President.

Attest: IDA C. CRADDOCK, Secretary.

Philadelphia, Sept. 1, 1890.

The Coming Congress.

If indications go for anything it will be the largest gathering of Secularists ever held. The signs of the times point that way. The railroads and steamboats will carry the delegates and visitors to and from the Congress at reduced rates.

The national organization—President Westbrook and his able corps of assistants—are doing yeoman service to make the Congress exceed the most sanguin expectations. We, the Portsmouth auxiliary, are aiding them in every way we can.

We hav a splendid musical program under way. Friday and Saturday evenings of the Congress brass bands and the G. A. R. drum corps will play in front of Opera Hall previous to the opening of the exercises. On the inside, Abe White's superb orchestra, Miller & Nagleisen's Spanish Students and their orchestra of six pieces, will render selections. During the afternoon of Friday and Saturday Miss Sarah Stevens will perform on the piano with her sister, Miss Polly, accompanying her on the violin. At this time, A. G. Field, the great minstrel king, and his famous company of artists will be present. His orchestra will render difficult and beautiful selections. His world celebrated sextet will sing popular melodies.

Let Liberals everywhere attend. Loan your presence and your time to this event. "Act well your part, there all the honor lies."

THE SEATTLE BARBERS' BARBAROUS ATTEMPT TO OBTAIN A BARBAROUS SUNDAY LAW FOR BARBERS.

The following remonstrance tells its own story. It proved effectiv, and the petition of the barbers was tabled. But it was another proof that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty. The ordinance asked for came very near being granted by the council. I only discovered the attempt in the nick of time, as the following extract from the proceedings of the city council will testify.

Mr. Hall said he was advised that there was nothing to prevent the council from passing an ordinance closing the barber shops on Sundays. The judiciary committee might as well report favorably, and the council could do as it pleased about passing it. The mayor remarked that he had been requested to ask the council to defer action for the present, as a remonstrance would be presented.

THE REMONSTRANCE.

WASHINGTON SECULAR UNION,
2104 SIXTH ST., SEATTLE, WASH.

TO THE MAYOR AND COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF SEATTLE, Gentlemen: The Washington Secular Union, having been organized to protect its members, and all other worthy citizens, in the absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, as guaranteed by our state constitution, respectfully call your attention, and solicit your earnest consideration, of the following facts in connection with a petition of the master barbers of Seattle, asking your honorable body to pass an ordinance prohibiting barbers from doing business or work at their trade or craft on Sundays, under penalty of a fine of $25 for the first, $35 for the second, and $50 for the third offense.

Such an ordinance prohibiting men from following their honest occupations at any time under penalty of arrest and fine is to relegate honest work to the realm of crime.

If it is wrong for barbers to work on Sunday, why is it not equally so on Saturday or Monday?

If you pass an ordinance and make shaving or hair-cutting an offense because done on Sunday, then the law, declaring such acts to be illegal, is a religious law, enacted for the purpose of favoring one class of religionists. For if your honorable body were to enact an ordinance that no shaving or hair-cutting should be done on Wednesdays, under like penalties, every barber in Seattle would demur.

Any law enforcing Sunday observance, or the cessation from honest work from respect to any day as a religious or holy day, would be unconstitutional. Our state constitution, Art. 1, Sec. ii, declares: "Absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment, belief, and worship shall be guaranteed to every individual, and no one shall be disturbed in person or property on account of religion."

Hence, no person pursuing any legitimate occupation or lawful pleasure or pastime on Sunday, any more than on any other day of the week, can be disturbed either in person or property because of anyone else's religious sentiment.

The constitution clearly defines and positivly states the only conditions which can render a person liable to be disturbed in person or property, to wit, acts of licentiousness or practices incompatible with the peace of the state.

The attention of your honorable body is especially called to the fact that in our state constitutions not alone religious faith and worship is assured, but absolute freedom in all religious sentiment, and no citizen can be disturbed in person or property on account of religion, or religious rites or observances.

The greater part of the commuuity may be fully agreed concerning some matter of conscience, but if only one among them holds a different opinion, his or her rights of conscience are just as sacred as those of all others, and must be respected, for our constitution guarantees absolute freedom of conscience in all matters of religious sentiment to every individual.

If any number of the master barbers of Seattle desire to abstain from work on Sunday, or any other day, there is nothing to prevent them so doing—no law or city ordinance is necessary to enable them to exercise that undisputed privilege. But simply for the purpose of protecting a number of master barbers from each other's cupidity and lack of faith in keeping agreement to close their shops and do no work on Sundays, they should not seek from your honorable body the passage of an ordinance that would deprive others of their constitutional rights, and render honest occupation infamous and unlawful.

George Washington declared, "Every man who conducts himself as a good citizen is accountable alone to God for his religious faith."

The observance of Sunday, or sun's day, is a good old pagan custom. Its enforcement at the muzzle of a municipal ordinance would be as obnoxious and uncalled for as the enforcement of church attendance or family prayers by the same means.

We hav no established religion in the state of Washington. The Mohammedans who abstain from work on Friday, the Jews, Seventh Day Adventists, and Baptists who rigidly observe Saturday, the seventh day, can only be made to observe Sunday by an infringement on their constitutional right to their own opinions in all matters of religious sentiment and observance.

Seattle is a city of progress, the metropolis of the most prosperous state of the Union, and your petitioners pray that no act of yours shall relegate us back to the days of the Inquisition or of religious dictation.

Under the constitution of the young giant state of Washington every man enjoys the same rights of conscience and is responsible to no earthly tribunal for his religious faith, and cannot be made by fine or penalty to observe holy days, or other religious festivals, against his honest convictions.

Legislativ bodies having jurisdiction can declare legal holidays in which no business can be enforced by one man on another, but hav no right to dictate the manner of observance of the day by the individual. One man can work, another pray, and so on, as it suits the individual, but no man under the constitution of Washington, nor any legislativ body, has a right to say to any individual, whether barber, butcher, or priest, "Thou shalt not work."

We therefore as individuals and as an organization protest against your honorable body assuming to pass an ordinance in violation of the constitutional rights and religious liberties of the citizen, thereby imposing on him the expense of defending himself and his constitutional rights.

Respectfully submitted, C. B. REYNOLDS, Secretary.
R. WINSOR, President.

Mr. Heywood Recalls Some Notable Cases.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I was glad indeed to hear of Mr. Harman's release on a writ of error, showing that there is at least one judge out there who does not think a man should be imprisoned merely on a difference of opinion in matters where he happened to be ahead of some other people, in right discerned and duty done.

Garrison used to say that reformers can get out of jail easier than they can get in; sense of right and spirit of liberty win, ultimately, no matter who or what opposes. In our cells here each convict is furnished with a Bible; turning through it I find many notable jail cases, the "Acts of the Apostles" causing as many or more arrests and imprisonments as Abolitionists, Freethinkers, and Free Lovers hav "experienced religion" in, later. But the Infidels took it philosophically, then as now:

When Herod would hav brought him forth the same night Peter was sleeping between two soldiers, bound with two chains, and the keepers before the door kept the prison (Acts xii, 6).

Then as now, the Radicals, "lunatics," "cranks," Anarchists, Wordocrats, were simply ahead of their time in personating individual sight and strength.

Among other books in the library here I asked for James Anthony Froude's "Bunyan," and hav learned much that is new to me. Like Hugh O. Pentecost, Stephen Pearl Andrews's father, Rev. Elisha Andrews, whom my father and mother, Ezra and Dorcas Roper Hoar, used to hear preach in Princeton, and Roger Williams, the immortal exponent of soul liberty, John Bunyan was a Baptist minister who took his call to preach from God within him, not from king or bishop out of him. Born in 1628, he died in 1688; from 1658 to 1672, twelve or fourteen years, he was in Bedford jail for free speech. The government was very lenient with him, letting him go out on his simple word, once as far away as London! It was as if Warden Russell was allowed to permit me to go home now and then, and stay over Sunday, or come on and hav a chat with you and other Nonconformists in New York. When I was in Dedham jail in 1878, H. H. Bigelow, of Worcester, got up a barbecue at Lake Quinsegamond, roasted an ox in the woods whole, had General Butler there as orator, and offered to leave $20,000 as security with Sheriff Wood, if he would allow him to take me to Worcester to speak at that meeting and return me safe to Hotel Dedham; but Sheriff Wood wouldn't.

Commenting on the fact that a fellow, even in such a tight place, can be easy, if he is right, morally and spiritually, Rev. John Summerfield, the celebrated old-time New York preacher, said to sinners in your city: "The church was praying in tears, wondering what would become of them if their strong champion was taken from them. The enemies of God on earth and the devils in hell were rejoicing that they had Peter in their power. The angels in heaven, ever intent on the mysteries of providence in redemption, were bending down to see what God would do with Peter. When heaven and earth and hell were thinking of Peter, what were Peter's thoughts? What was Peter doing? Peter was asleep!"

Any time during the twelve or fourteen years' imprisonment Bunyan would hav been released if he would hav promised not to preach, publicly; indeed, the object of letting him out on his word of parole seemed to be to get by the case that way. But no sooner out than in barns, woods, or wherever there were some to hear he took to preaching. He would not shut up, so they shut him up, but surrendered at last. During the protracted struggle Mrs. Bunyan went to London to plead her husband's case before the judges—the distinguished jurist Sir Matthew Hale being one of them. They listened courteously to her. After she had made her appeal Mr. Justice Twisden asked whether, if her husband were released, he would refrain from preaching in public in future. She at once replied that he dared not leave off preaching so long as he could speak. The judge asked if she thought her husband was to be allowed to do as he pleased. She said he was a peaceable person, and wished only to be restored to a position in which he could maintain his family. They had four small children that could not maintain themselvs, one of them being blind, and they had nothing to liv upon so long as her husband was in prison but the charity of friends. Hale remarked that she looked very young to hav four children. "I am but mother-in-law to them," she said, "having not been married yet two full years. I was with child when my husband was first apprehended, but being young, I, being dismayed at the news, fell into labor and so continued eight days. I was delivered, but my child died." Hale was markedly kind to her. He told her that as the conviction had been recorded they could not set it aside. She might sue out a pardon or obtain a writ of error, which would be simpler and less expensiv. She left the court in tears—tears, however, which were not altogether the tears of suffering innocence. "It was not so much," she said, "that they were so hard-hearted toward me and my husband, but to think what a sad account such poor creatures would hav to giv at the coming of the Lord." Later the policy of the government changed. He was released May 8, 1672, the case was won, and he was free the rest of his life.

Bunyan's work in prison was making tags for boot-laces. To his imprisonment we owe "Pilgrim's Progress," "The Holy War," and an immortal example of mental freedom. Milton's great discourse, "The Liberty of Unlicensed Printing," was delivered in Parliament in 1644. The subject of my graduating speech at Bunn University, September, 1856, was "Milton, the Advocate of Intellectual Liberty." Theoretically, religious liberty, freedom of speech and the press, are asserted in the federal and all our state constitutions. Morals are a part of religion, the greater including the less. The struggle now is to realize the right of private judgment in morals. As in Bunyan's case, so now, nobody is invaded, nobody hurt. When truth looks into a popular evil, she gets the door slammed in her face. But, as Arnold of Rugby said, "Nothing is so revolutionary as the strain to keep things where they are in opposition to growing tendencies." "England," said Lord Brougham, "survives because she knows when to bend." Comstock, Wanamaker, Carpenter, and Foster are merely Mrs. Grundy's broom trying to turn back advancing tides of progress. Judge Devons's action as attorney-general, advising Hayes to release me in 1878, Judge Nelson's rulings in 1883, Judge Pitman's action in 1884, United States District Attorney Geo. M. Stearns's action in 1887, will stand as law, Carpenter and Foster to the contrary notwithstanding. As Mrs. Heywood says, "The question is whether Congress, the legislature, and the courts, or a few vice-society lice running about over the body politic, are the government." We stand now for the integrity of the human body as well as of the human mind; for the right to print and deliver, by mail or otherwise, to regular subscribers a newspaper having plain-spoken opinions on morals, physiology, and language.

The Revision of Creeds.

Every Christian creed has claimed to set forth the doctrin of the Bible—that, the whole of that, and nothing but that. It is now coming to pass, more and more, that those making, believing, and preaching these doctrins are disbelieving many of them, and revising them out of their church standards. Therefore, as to the inspiration of their Bible and the revelation of their God, out of their own mouths they are condemned. Their only possible apology is, that they hav misunderstood the book. Where, then, is their revelation? Could not their God of perfection giv a perfect revelation which they could understand? Having misunderstood it in the past, having preached errors to us for many years past, how are we to know that they are right now? Hav they had a new, an amended revelation? or a new baptism of the Holy Ghost? The old Westminster Confession held by the more extensivly learned and profound churches of our world, is now undergoing revision to expunge its chief dogmas, the decrees of foreordination, predestination, and election. And yet a respectable minority in our land, and a great majority in Scotland, hold without a shadow of doubt to these great ruling sovereign dogmas. Besides, thousands of Calvinists in other churches can never giv them up till they giv up their Bible. The old iron-side Baptists can no more doubt them than they can their religious existence. The only possibility of getting the purposes and decrees of their God out of their minds, is to chloroform their brains. Now, tell us what we are to know or do about your Christianity? Is there anything short of getting your Lord to send us another revelation as to which of these great dogma-parties is right?

Moreover, are we to be told that his son, the second person in the triune God, is wrong? Let anyone read in Luke iv, 23–29, and then say that the principle of sovereign election is not taught, meaning really that no language on earth can teach it. The same must be said of a passage in Luke iv, 21. Again, Paul is the leading inspired writer of the gospel. In his Eph. i, 11, he tells the disciples that they were "predestinated according to him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will." Likewise in Rom. viii, 28–31, the same doctrin is distinctly taught.

And, if possible, above all, in Rom. ix, 9–21, no language on earth, or in heaven, if there be any, can set forth the doctrin of election more explicitly. It is even stronger than that in the Calvinistic creeds. Here is every Bible believer confronted positivly and palpably with predestination, and the election of a very small part of the human family—scarcely one in a million—for whom Christ died, to take them to a heaven, the others to a hell. The Unitarians and Universalists are unable to believe it. Those who hav preached it are now eliminating it from their creeds, and yet it stares them in the face, as do many filthy passages, in their Bibles.

Moreover, professing that Bible, are the Jews, the Catholics, and the Protestants all antagonizing each other. In which army of the belligerents are we to enlist to please the God of this Bible? Besides, from the beginning there hav been two diverse conflicting and decided theological parties—called the Calvinistic and Arminian. How are the honest lovers of truth to know which of these is right or which to join?

The New York Sun and other able secular journals hav foreseen and foretold the end. As the creeds crumble away the Bible must go with them, and then the faith of those professing to believe it; hell will go overboard its fires quenched, and finally the solid ground of Materialism and Atheism appear, uniting all common sense and science.

Misplaced Confidence.

There is loud wailing over the death of the two young Maine missionaries who went to Freetown, Sierra Leone, West Africa, last spring to carry the gospel into the interior of the dark nation.

Mr. Gates, only twenty-three years old, writes back to a friend in Lewiston, Me., only a week before he was stricken with the dreadful fever that ended his life in eight days, how the Lord had blessed them and supplied their every want, they were full of faith and courage; but that he would return at once and not go into the interior if he thought the climate would injure him (not much faith nor trust in that) for he would not wish to pass an invalid's existence (where was his courage?), but he had implicit confidence in God's keeping. He says in his letter, "It has been a matter of constant prayer among us that we might be led as to going on (into the interior) and we were finally unanimous that it would please the Lord to hav us strike on." And yet it "pleased the Lord" in two weeks to strike them both dead! He adds, "I am sure God's hand is not shortened, and he can care for his servants as if they were in America traveling among friends." Is not this a sure case of misplaced confidence in the Lord? How do we know but the Lord wished to kill these two young men and so lured them, with false promises, out into this deadly climate for that purpose! We hav a case in scripture exactly of this kind. God wanted to kill Ahab, and he could devise no better way than to get him up to Ramoth Gilead and hav him fall in battle. But how to get him up there puzzled the Lord amazingly, that is, if he is God. So he assembled all the hosts of heaven to aid him with their advice. One spirit spoke after this manner, and another after that manner, but God did not fall in with any of their plans.

At last one spirit came out and stood before the Lord, who was satisfactory. He said, "I will entice Ahab to go up to Ramoth-Gilead."

And the Lord answered, "Wherewith?"

And he said, "I will go out and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets."

God, delighted with the proposition, exclaimed, "Go out and do even so."

And this one spirit went out of heaven and jumped into four hundred of the Lord's prophets, and each one told Ahab to go up to battle and he should prosper. He went, and was slain. Please read this account for yourselvs. It will be found in 2 Chron. xviii. Now, it looks as if God wanted these men to die—wanted to get them where the fever would kill them—so when they went to him in "constant prayer," to entice them out he pretended it would "please" him to hav them go. He accomplished his purpose; they are dead. Why should the missionary world make such a hullaballoo over it, when they profess to believe they hav full confidence in the Lord, and he doeth all things well?

Lectures and Meetings.

MR. W. PERKINS, whose name is somewhat familiar to our readers as an able writer, desires us to announce that he is ready to lecture on the easiest terms. His address is 1,835 Montgall avenue, Kansas City, Mo.

W. F. JAMIESON has accepted Judge Westbrook's invitation to attend the Secular Congress. Liberals in Ohio desiring courses of lectures can address him at Kasson, Minn. The debate of eight nights bids fair to be largely attended, as Elder Nichols is a very popular and original preacher, in whom the people hav great confidence.

CHARLES WATTS will attend the American Secular Union Congress at Portsmouth, O., October 31st. He will also lecture in New York at the Manhattan Liberal Club, Friday, November 7th, and for the Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia, Sunday, November 9th. While in the States he would be pleased to make other engagements, and Secular Unions desiring his services should address him at 334 Wellesley street, Toronto, Ontario.

J. E. REMSBURG gave a course of three lectures at Sedalia, Mo., August 30th and 31st. September 15th he set out on a ten thousand mile tour through the far West. He lectured at Humboldt, Neb., the 16th; Alexandria, Neb., 17th; Gibbon, Neb., 18th; Minden, Neb., 19th; Yuma, Col., 20th; Boulder, Col., 21st; Canon City, Col., 22d; Aspen, Col., 23d; Glenwood Springs, Col., 24th; Grand Junction, Col., 26 h. The Aspen daily Mail thus refers to his lecture there: "The Wheeler Opera House was comfortably filled last evening to hear J. E. Remsburg deliver his lecture. The subject was 'The Apostle of Liberty, Thomas Paine.' The lecturer was introduced by Judge J. W. Deane in a short address. Mr. Remsburg in a most delightful and forcible manner gave a history of Thomas Paine, and his efforts which led to the Declaration of Independence, and charmed his hearers by his grasp of the subject."

But He Is the Man who Said It.

"The Prohibition organ, the Voice, says:

"'The Infidel who insisted that he could hav improved upon this world by making health contagious as well as disease, was abashed to find out that health is contagious.'

"Colonel Ingersoll is not likely to be so much abashed at anything as at the colossal impudence and mendacity of the writers for religious periodicals.—THE TRUTH SEEKER.

"Come down. Who said anything about Colonel Ingersoll? Is he the only Infidel the world has ever seen?"—The Voice in Reply.

Colonel Ingersoll is not the only Infidel in the world, but his happens to be the original voice which uttered the saying quoted. It may be found in the "Gods," pages 72–73, and runs in this wise: "A very pious friend of mine, having heard that I had said the world was full of imperfections, asked me if the report was true. Upon being informed that it was, he expressed great surprise that anyone could be guilty of such presumption. He said that, in his judgment, it was impossible to point out an imperfection. 'Be kind enough,' said he, 'to name even one improvement that you could make, if you had the power' 'Well,' said I, 'I would make good health catching, instead of disease.'"

Origin of Our Religion.

When we know how improbable it was that these Greek gospel writers could really hav any certain knowledge of the things which they narrated, incidents which it is said occurred over one hundred and fifty years before they were recorded, we can place but little confidence in their testimony. In making up their stories, they must assume most of this knowledge and write with the assurance as though they were eye-witnesses, or as being on the ground to receive testimony of those who heard and saw what transpired.

The Chaldeans or "wise men of the East" were known to the Greeks to be star-gazers, astronomers, astrologers, and they believed their great men were born under certain stars, which afterward ruled their destiny. The Greek writers accordingly coupled "the wise men of the East" and the story of the star of Bethlehem with the birth of Joshua, to giv the occurrence the appearance of miracle and thus appeal to the minds of the credulous.

In preparing these gospels their unknown writers evidently had two important points in view. The first was to make them appear to be based upon the history, the statements, and the prophecies of the old Hebrew scriptures. The second, to interweave through them enough of the Jewish ideas, of Roman rule, and of the peculiarities and influence of adjacent countries, to satisfy the credulous and uncritical of the plausibility and probability of the narrativ being historically reliable. While this has been done to some extent, it will not bear careful comparison or critical examination, without an exposure of many fallacies and contradictions, and much to show how ignorant and incompetent the writers were for what they attempted to do.

It is well known to careful, critical readers that these gospels will not bear such examination. This method of mingling mythology and miraculous occurrences in their religious writings, was universal then. The scores of gospels and holy books written at that period abounded with fabulous stories and incredible miracles, and it was on this ground that they were condemned and rejected.

The story of the wise men following the star accorded so with the known Chaldean faith that it was left in the gospels because of the plausible and supernatural weight it would add to the record, in enlisting the interest of those who were uncritical, yet religiously inclined. It appealed to their veneration, their sense of the marvelous and supernatural.

The more successful gospel-writers understood the condition of the minds of the masses and adapted their composition to what the better people would bear, and be willing to believe.

The astounding miracles, recorded as accompanying the crucifixion, were well calculated to arrest and startle the Greek mind. Some bold and daring writer ventured on this experiment. Knowing what a faith and reverence the Greeks had for their gods, and that the stories about the prophet Joshua had been so exaggerated and magnified that he had been made superhuman, and so much power and virtue had been ascribed to him that he had been called a God and a son of God, as a matter of course when a god was slain some catastrophe must be visited on the earth, to evidence that a great crime had been committed against the rights and powers of the gods. These miracles, in connection with Joshua, were not found in the earlier copies of the gospels. So the late revisers tell us.

They were doubtless inserted in after-centuries with the view of giving additional efficacy to their records, in exciting religious awe, reverence, and fear, and enlisting the emotions more deeply in the interest of a supernatural faith and sustaining the church.

It is well known by biblical scholars, that these gospels abound in interpolations, emendations, and interpretations they hav received from copyists, commentators, and translators, which were no part of the early copies of the Greek manuscripts.

Modern scholarship, and especially the late New Testament revisers, hav revealed to us abundant evidence of these many corruptions and perversions.

But because they hav been so long believed and tolerated as genuin, they tell us, they thought it safest and best not to disturb public faith, so they let them remain.

It was well known then, as it has been abundantly proved and demonstrated since, in the history of all religions and the experience of all religious sects, that it is not necessary for any faith or belief, doctrin or theology or creed, to be true or rational, consistent or possible even, to hav it believed, in order that it may subdue the mind and exercise a controling influence over the life and conduct of the individual.

But rather a false, irrational, marvelous faith, or a belief in the miraculous, absurd, and impossible, exercises more power to subjugate the believer to its exactions and requirements, than do the obligations felt by those who entertain more intelligent and practical views.

It is the hold the belief gets on the feelings and sentiments that givs it efficacy, without regard to its truthfulness.

This is so much the case that there are multitudes now to be found among Christians, educated, cultured, and intelligent, among clergy and laity—in short, nearly all those who claim to be religious in all sects—of that class who can not, dare not, or will not venture to examin or to inquire into the origin, authenticity, or even the reason for their belief. Whether right or wrong, to be satisfied with the comfort and trust the faith brings is enough. And this state of mind, this acquiescence and resignation to the effect the faith has over the feelings, is religion. Then why question, doubt, or cavil, or think, lest they should lead to unsettlement and uncertainty?

Wherever inquiry has been indulged, it has led toward truth, and the growing mental freedom of this age is leading all the wisest and best men from the church.

The errors, falsehoods, and illusions hold church organizations together.

Without the cementing and adhesiv effect produced by a common sympathy in the defense and support of these religious follies and falsehoods, they would crumble and disintegrate. Truth requires no sect, neither can it create one.

Where the truth is, there is unity.

Falsehood alone keeps the human family separated from a common bond, a common interest, and common good.

Science, or demonstrated truth, knows no sect. It has nothing to conceal, and nothing to defend. It is calm, unruffled, patient, and imperturbable. Planted on the eternal rock, it is immovable and everlasting. When the votaries of error want rest, truth welcomes them to its eternal embrace and home. So thought and taught Joshua the prophet, when he said, "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free"—free from the thraldom of slavery to error.

Religion in any ceremonial or superstitious form in which it is believed and practiced, technically as such, is a figment of the human mind, developed in the darker ages.

Wherever people are not susceptible of or are beyond the reach of knowledge and cannot be led and governed by scientific truth, religion has come to them as a substitute. If humanity is in the dark, it demands some comfort. So it draws its solace from faith. Religion will yet long be a needed agency for the race. It is only where science supplants or supersedes its necessity, that it will or can be abandoned.

When we hav the absolute truth, it will free us from religious thraldom.

It is reported that Joshua said on his trial, "To this end was I born, for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness to the truth." He evidently saw beyond all religions.

I use the word Joshua to designate the Jewish prophet, because to his people, the Hebrews, it meant a messiah or savior. But it is evident that the Greek idiom was such that it was neither pronounced or spelled that way in Greece. They spelled and pronounced it a little abbreviated.

It was only Jeshu, or Jesu, which has nearly the same sound as Joshua. In Latin the s is added, making it Jesus. This may be called a corruption of the original, but it is simply the result of changing a word from one language to another.

Jesu Christi in Greek would be Joshua the wise men in Hebrew or Aramic.

In English we hav it Jesus Christ, and hav given to it a new and unwarrantable definition which tends more to perplex the mind and embarrass the understanding, than to convey any clear knowledge or idea of the way the Jews understood or appreciated him.

All through the New Testament the writers and translators giv him not only these names but many others which are unjustifiable, perverting and misleading from the original names found in the early Greek manuscript and intended to be given him by the early writers.

This abuse and liberty taken with the text, and the language necessary to harmonize with it, with the false impression conveyed to the mind, has made much of the New Testament an unsolved mystery, an incomprehensible riddle, to the simple-minded, honest, inquiring reader.

This metaphysical obscurity, this ambiguous nomenclature, or vocabulary, furnished eager delight to all classes of sectaries for centuries, in building up creeds and expounding dogmas and doctrins they claim to hav found concealed beneath this inexplicable verbiage, then pronouncing their theories the Christian religion.

There is much evidence running through the New Testament that many of the early Christians or gospel writers understood religion to be simply believing in and living up to a correct, or intelligent system of ethics.

For there is really much of that taught and urged as the only true religion. If it were possible for us to sift the latter superstitions, miracles, and mysteries out of it, and could we eliminate the idioms, the figures, allegories, metaphors, and fables out of the text, with the multitude of parables that hav been spoiled, perverted, misunderstood, and ruined as illustrations by meddlesome or ignorant doctors, priests, and bishops—if we could get at the simple, sensible thoughts that lie buried or more than half concealed under the verbiage of the letter, the rubbish of ignorance and mysticism, with which it has been enveloped and disguised, we would see the intended good sense of the original writers.

It was the discarding of the spirit, the simple objects and intentions, of the early, intelligent proselytes, and placing all kinds of false and illusiv definitions or interpretations on the corrupted, misunderstood letter, that has been the bane of believers and the wreck of the religion as a simple code or system of morals.

There is yet enough of sterling, exalted, unobjectionable statement of immutable, abstract, positiv truth, to overshadow, eclipse, and render nugatory all the metaphysical and mythological drivel that pious and bigoted enthusiasts hav inserted, either from ignorance and false notions or from selfish or sinister designs. To destroy the simplicity, to make the text obscure, and to mystify religion was the design, that an order of priestly expounders would be needed, and make a profitable and honorable occupation out of the task of elucidating to the ignorant its deep meaning and divinely concealed but saving mysteries.

From the reign of Constantine, when the importance of properly expounding these scriptures began to be most seriously felt, in order to secure the one faith and the only one interpretation out of the writings, this letter of the manuscript; to insure uniformity in one universal Catholic religion, up to the present hour there has been controversy, caviling, and quarreling over the letter—the letter falsified, made corrupt, unmeaning, senseless, and inexplicable, by officious and conceited intermeddlers, writers, commentators, and copyists of previous centuries. This was done in the interests of paganism, of pagan beliefs and theories that were popular and prevalent in all Christian localities.

Greece, Rome, Persia, Chaldea, and Africa furnished those Bible makers and Bible expounders, these enemies to truth and to the simplicity of the original, simply Christian religion.

The contests over the trinity between the two divisions of the principal sect seemed to engage the attention of the scholarly class so far as to allow the smaller sects to remain comparativly undisturbed.

These sects gradually dwindled away in significance till they were practically out of the field of combat. Yet some of the different, peculiar views that divided them, and separated them from the orthodox majority, are on record, and hav always since been referred to as heresies and dangerous.

There were the Novatians, Marcionites, Manicheans, Montanists, Donatists, Sabelleans, Nestorians, Cerintheans, Magians, Therapeuts, Epicureans, Esseneans, and others which were classed as Agnostics.

The trinitarians, or orthodox, headed by Athanasius on one side and Arius on the other, with their followers of bishops, presbyters, and priests, their army of monks and adherents, kept up a long and fierce conflict.

The creed adopted at the council of Nicea was intended to settle this doctrinal difficulty, but it proved an entire failure.

It seems singular to us now that a controversy should so long rage over an idea, a figment of the imagination, over a vision that was entirely without foundation, and over which there was not a semblance of a shadow of reality.

It was a conception originating among the religious polemics of Alexandria, and never had any part or connection with the teachings of Joshua nor with the earlier proselytes.

Yet it has distracted Christendom, having successfully deceived and deluded it for fifteen hundred years. Such is the infatuation it has produced, that to deny or to doubt it, knowing as we do how it originated and was introduced into the church, is to be reproached as unsound in faith, if not stigmatized as Infidel, and to be held in suspicion.

The precise point between these combatants was how to engraft the trinity onto the Christian religion and make the union complete and satisfactory to the caviling pagans and simple-minded, in order to gain them over as converts to the Christian faith. This word Christos, now spelled Christ, this title given to Joshua on account of his wisdom and goodness in enlightening the people and trying to save them, was to be, through some thaumaturgic or magical influence, converted into a divinity. It was only a word, but a divinity must be devised somehow out of it, or out of the supposed power which it must represent, for a third person in the trinity. These leaders could not agree just precisely as to how this should be done. They both had plausible processes, but different.

This contest caused Constantine much trouble. It was his choice and desire that it should be settled. He alternately cajoled and censured both leaders; had them both deposed from their bishopricks, and, through persecution and persuasion, he tried to bring it to an amicable adjustment. Arius had been banished to the desert, but the emperor relented through the importunities of the court women, and the edict was issued to restore him to the see at Alexandria. He arrived in the city, but, while in the street on his way to the church, he was taken suddenly ill and died. It was hinted that the prayers offered by his enemies, asking that he should never be restored, were helped in their answers through poison, which had been secretly administered in his food or drink between his arrival and the hour for meeting.

These heathen horrors hav haunted the church all through the centuries. Now it is "infant damnation;" "the office of the holy spirit." Then it was the physical composition of a personified abstraction. What an idea—to take a little Greek word, christos, meaning wisdom, whose mythological synonym was the goddess Sophia, and deify it without defining it; apotheosize it by the commands of the Holy Ghost, then quarrel over the manner in which it came into existence, after making it to their own taste and fancy and christening it a son of God. This son of God was not made, and did not exist, till the fourth century.

There were other hard words manufactured to represent the terms and merits of this controversy. Those on one side called themselvs Homoousians; on the other they were Homoiousians; the difference of one letter in a name represented the difference of faith in the contesting parties.

This controversy over the body they made out of the procession of the Holy Ghost from the father's essence into the word wisdom, or christos, was very serious. Perhaps we cannot, at this period of our history, and with the changed conditions in which we are placed, conceive the difficulty and delicacy of the task, and the nature of a genius that could crowd a spirit or ghost into a word, and know that it was comfortably lodged there, swelling that word into a God.

The life of one champion was ended, but the abstruse question long remained without a satisfactory solution. It was forced into the background to make room for the accomplishment of other purposes.

The suppression of the Gnostics, and turbulent dissidents in various parts of the empire, that uniformity of faith might be established, was an important project, and severe measures were adopted for that purpose. Long and bloody wars ensued; trinitarian Christianity was put to a great strain, and driven to desperate resources—persecutions, banishments, suppression of all learning—and the faith was largely planted by the point of the trinitarian sword. Every liberal and enlightened movement in schools and colleges was suppressed. This initiated the period when there was not one in ten thousand in the church that could read or write.

There are but few people in the church, whether from birthright or conversion, that know anything about the history of the religion they profess. Neither do they care to know. It is nothing to them as to how much fraud and invention of designing, ambitious, and unscrupulous men has been imposed on them. They know not where their religion originated, or how it was concocted; what intrigue and wicked measures were adopted to foster it and giv it prominence; how it was first manufactured as a feeble and contemptible form of paganism, with some sentiments attributed to Joshua combined with it, and then forced with relentless energy on the people, who hav accepted it as the only alternativ. If Christianity has any history, this is the substance of it. It has no other history, and who knows not this knows nothing about the what and whence of his religion. He is the dupe and victim of a phantom.

The masses do not think it desirable to know anything about it, and if they knew all about it they would not believe it. They are happier ignorant, and more contented to take the faith on trust than they would be if they knew more of it. The church, the creed, and the Bible are made to sustain it, the preacher to enforce it, and they are told it is good, divine, from God. They take this testimony as sufficient, and preferable to any history, no matter how true or authentic, if it conflicts with this. They despise truth and spurn it when offered to them to antidote or to correct this popular and palatable falsehood so long believed and crystallized into a faith. Their fathers knew no better, neither do they want to. If it served them, it will serve us. It is safer to rely on and more acceptable than the truth. True or false, it brings comfort and confidence, and that is all we want. If the truth unsettles, it is an evil. Let what be said that may about the history or genuinness of our religion, it has been tested for centuries and given satisfaction, and our own experience is a confirmation of this judgment. We hav learned it from our parents, from the church, religious literature, from the lives of the worthy saints and martyrs who died for it and sealed its excellence and efficacy with their blood. If it was false, how could the world hav advanced in refinement, intelligence, and a high civilization under its sway?

All this and much more is urged in its defense as conclusiv evidence that it is genuin and of divine origin. These are the reasons and convictions that are offered by the ignorant believer, yet they are just as applicable to any other religion, and as sound a proof, where other circumstances are equal, of its genuinness. Civilization has really fought its way onward, inch by inch, in opposition to the church and its decrees.

The palmiest days of the church, when faith ruled the Christian world, were the ages of intellectual darkness. The first efforts to break from this gloom and debasement were met by guillotin and the fagot. Luther and his successors were proscribed, anathematized, threatened, tortured, and condemned.

Bruno (Giordano), the astronomer and scientist, was burnt at the stake; Galileo was forced to his knees with his hand on the Bible, to recant or to die for his scientific discoveries; Michael Servetus, the physician, the scholar, and scientist, was burnt at the instigation of Calvin, one of the great lights of the church, a leader of a sect.

Tens of thousands were tortured and martyred in this Protestant, or early struggle out of the bondage and darkness, when religion instead of law ruled the state. When religion or Christianity was supreme and triumphant, civilization was but an empty name.

Our civilization to-day is not what it should be, in many respects, because the church still exercises too much power, and restricts it by its pernicious faith. The church religion keeps the people in darkness and error, punishes them for bad conduct, tells them to repent and then go to heaven.

The church dreads the light and truth of a wise civilization because it would undermine and make nugatory the creed.

It claims that through its portals is the passport to heaven. It flouts at science and demonstrated truth when they conflict with the faith, the creed, the ritual, that reads people to heaven. The substance of its teachings is, Trust to God and go to heaven in the dark. The tree of knowledge bears bitter fruit. It is safer to shun it and rely on faith in the foibles and fiendish concoctions of fifteen hundred years ago, in an age when faith was forced down the throat with the sword and cimeter.

There is not a church in the land, I care not how liberal it is, that is not poisoned and palsied by the virus of that old superstition!

There is no religion under the name of Christianity that is not an offshoot and a slave in some degree to that ancient heathen creed. It may be but shadowy and feeble, but its track is there, in the language, the tone, the phraseology, the form or sanctity of acts or words.

They all cherish some of the relics, the modes and manners, of the old Roman mother.

Protestantism was started to get rid of some of the coarsest and vilest of these.

What it has not abandoned, it retains, it cherishes, and transmits as its heirloom from that ancient representation of the Christian faith. We sneer at the Catholics, not knowing that all we hav we inherited from them. The legacy is venerable, but we hold it as precious on that account. T. E. LONGSHORE.

The Common Sense Club.

Capt. Robt. C. Adams at the Toronto Convention.

The chief needs of man are food, shelter, love, leisure, and education. Mental liberty is essential to their attainment. The work of Secularism is to secure these advantages through Freethought. It must not only inculcate the principles of Naturalism, but must apply them to the practical affairs of life. This must be done through the organization of Common Sense Clubs, having the motto, Use Common Sense; the maxim, Natural Law Rules the World; and the precepts, Be Happy, Do Good, Do No Harm. Emerson says, "The cure of a bad theology is not a new one, but common sense," and Lecky says that theology "is replaced by shrewd, secular, common sense." The Common Sense Club could in every village become the provider of entertainment and be the originator of plans for improvement. It could apply common sense to all the affairs of life. As to the home, it could consider how to relieve its drudgeries by coöperativ effort. As to the town, it could discuss whether it is sensible to giv over the supplying of all its needs to private capitalists, or whether it pays for a town to furnish its own gas, water, and electric light at cost, and to make its roads, run its tramways, and control the service of other general needs. As to the nation, we can form opinions as to the desirability of leaving the conduct of its affairs to private enterprise for the benefit of individuals or corporations, or whether the people collectivly should manage the post-office, railroads, telegraphs, sugar refineries, coal mines, and in time all great industries. It could discuss whether it is better for a people to buy their supplies where they can be got cheapest and of the best quality, or whether they should be restricted to the purchase of such goods as their countrymen can make and pay the price they may demand. The application of common sense to the question of capital and labor, to Sabbath observance and the opening of museums, libraries, art galleries, and excursion facilities on the workingman's rest-day, to religious formalities and dogmas, and to all things relating to man's welfare in this life, would result in the establishment of Secularism as the controling principle in human affairs.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

During the last four months the pope has been the recipient of $250 000. Of this sum $50 000 came from France, $63 000 from Italy, $31,000 from Germany, and $80,000 from the United States. The old saying, "The fool and his money are easily parted," seems to be true yet.—Bulletin Mensuelle.

The last number of Das Menshenthum contains an announcement from Frau Wilhelmi notifying her friends that the arrest orders issued by the courts of Kiel and Erfurt hav been withdrawn. She has returned to Undertürkheim, near Stuttgart. Can it be possible that a wave of self-respect has struck the authorities of those cities?

A new Christian sect has appeared. It makes No. 109 or 110, we are not sure which. The founder, Michael Baxter, the eccentric son of a crazy Irvingian, has proclaimed to the citizens of Basel that on March 5, 1896, at 3 A.M., the world is coming to an end, and all are to go down to the warm place except the 144,000 elect, who will start for their harps and a seat in Abraham's bosom.—Freidenker.

Here is an example of the education imparted by the church in Belgium. In the Antwerp provincial court a bill was introduced calling for five hundred francs to pay the expenses of sending persons bitten by dogs, supposed to be hydrophobic, to Pasteur. The clerical majority objected. It would be to slight Saint Hubertus, who for eleven hundred years had attended to that business. The Liberals laughed outright, but this did not affect the faithful; and the question was put to vote and with an overwhelming majority it was resolved to contribute five hundred francs to the Pasteur institute and Saint Hubert. This in the year 1890, July 15th.

Before long the various branches of science are to undergo a complete revolution, judging from the appearance of a Roman Catholic Society of Science, Literature, and Art, which will endeavor to bend the various branches of science in other directions. "This new academy," says Das Menshenthum, "will turn its special attention to natural science, mathematics, history, and philosophy, and under the leadership of its president, the brave Frhr. v. Helfert, prove 'physiologically' the immaculate conception, 'mathematically' the holy trinity, 'historically' the genealogy of Christ, and 'philosophically' Frhr. v. Helfert's own wisdom."

Mr. Viktor E. Lennstrand is getting quite aggressiv. He is no longer satisfied with lecturing in ordinary cities, nor even with disturbing Bishop Billings's peace, but goes to Dalarö, the fashionable Swedish bathing resort, and delivers his lectures. The clergy were dumfounded. They did not know what to do, so in want of anything better they declared that Lennstrand ought to be stoned. They did not stone him though, but confined themselvs to going around and tearing down the bills advertising the lectures. Yet in spite of all, a large and intelligent audience listened to our friend's exposition of Liberalism, and we dare say were quite surprised when made acquainted with the real essence of Liberalism.

In the German magazine Zeitschrift für Hygiene George Cornet publishes an essay on "The Mortality in Cloisters," and proves conclusivly from statistics of the last twenty-five years that the mortality is surprisingly large. In the order of Sisters of Mercy the average length of life is only thirty-six years; in many cloisters it sinks to thirty, twenty-eight, and even lower. The mortality as compared with that outside for the age of fifteen to twenty years, is four times as high; for the age of twenty to thirty years, three times as high; for the age of thirty to forty years, twice as high. The principal cause of death is tuberculosis, which in cloisters causes seventy-five per cent of the deaths, while in the wicked outside world it causes but fifteen to twenty per cent. This excessiv mortality, which shows how well Jehovah takes care of his own, is due partly to the careless way in which the nuns move about the sick, not using any disinfectants, and partly to the unnatural life enforced by cloister rules. —Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt.

What They Say About The Picture Book.

Moses Harman in Lucifer.

Among the noteworthy books received at this office during my enforced vacation is the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," issued by the Truth Seeker Company, New York.

While it is doubtless true that the famous cartoons of Watson Heston in THE TRUTH SEEKER giv offense to the prejudices of many readers, there can be no question that this method of teaching useful lessons is a most effectiv one. That Mr. Heston is one of the very best of living cartoonists, and that, as a whole, his pictures hav been and will be the means of doing much good in the way of eliminating old-time superstitions, I verily believe.

To be appreciated the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" must be seen. Each alternate page is filled with selections from well-known authors upon the subjects illustrated by the cartoons. These selections are printed in large and clear type, and altogether the book contains a storehouse of information, instruction, and innocent amusement that it would be hard to find elsewhere—at least, hard to purchase elsewhere for the sum of $2. It takes a pile of money to get out a single copy of a work like this, and we sincerely hope the orders will be sent in thick and fast, to gladden the hearts of the publishers and to make cheerful and happy the homes and lives of the purchasers.

The Specter that Threatens the Irish.

From a Daily Paper.

The most trustworthy information from public and private sources in all parts of Ireland is to the effect that the complete failure of the potato crop makes another great famin in that most unfortunate of lands practically inevitable. The point of actual suffering from hunger has not yet been reached, but the days of starvation, unless help comes, are not far off. A movement is on foot to bring to the attention of America the appalling calamity which now threatens Ireland before actual death from hunger has claimed any victims. Several meetings hav already been held, and organization will be so far perfected that the personnel of the organization and its plans will be announced in a few days. It has been decided to organize under the name of the American Committee for the Relief of Famin in Ireland. It is proposed to make its work cover both North and South America.

From the Loyal American.

It is reported that the potato crop in Ireland is a failure; if so, we may expect to hear an appeal made to Protestants to load ships to keep south and west Ireland from starving. This reminds us that we remember to hav heard a gentleman telling that he gave a $500 check to load a ship with provisions to keep starving Irishmen alive, and subsequently read in a Roman paper that the Irish had that year sent a very large sum of money as "Peter's pence" to the pope. He declared that the next time they got hungry, he proposed to let the pope feed them.

The Mormon Commission.

The Utah Commission has forwarded a report to the Secretary of the Interior of its doings for a year. The Commission, much to its regret, finds that the Mormons show no signs of relinquishing their faith, and hav even elected some disfranchised ex-polygamists to high offices in the church. And the Commission believes, though it has no proof, that forty-one male Mormons hav taken to themselvs plural wives. The Commission recommends that the powers of the Commission be so enlarged as to authorize and enable it to issue instructions which shall be binding upon the registrars of its appointment in the performance of their legal duties. The report also recommends the enactment of a law similar to the Idaho test law, "believing that it could do more to put an end to the teaching and practice of polygamy than has been accomplished by the partial enforcement of existing laws." In conclusion, the Commission reports what it said in its last report—that in this matter the government and Congress should take no backward or even wavering steps, but should continue the activ and vigorous enforcement of the laws and the improvement of them by the amendment of such as would make them more effectiv, and by enacting such other laws as experience may show to be wiser and more efficacious to accomplish the desired end.

There is nothing particularly surprising in this report. It is not a nineteenth century miracle that persecuted fanatics should cling to their superstition, nor is it the first time in history that inquisitors should ask for an enlargement of their powers. Thorough work can never be done except by officers authorized to invade houses and put the inhabitants to torture to force them to confess every secret of their existence.

The great trouble with the Commission and the law from which it derives its life, is that they do not limit their intention to stamping out polygamy, but aim also to extinguish the religious faith which leads to the beastly practice. Confiscation of corporate property cannot in any way affect the individual habits of the members of the corporation. The church did not giv pecuniary support to the polygamists; on the contrary the too-much-married members gave the church one-tenth of their incomes. To reduce the tithes would only allow them funds to support more wives. And to persecute them because they believe that polygamy is a means of saving grace is only to make them cling more firmly to that belief, and the more rash and fanatical among them would surely exemplify in their lives the faith they held, even at the risk of prison. These are the lessons of history, a thousand times impressed upon the race. A law against bigamy, honestly enforced, would be better than a cumbersome lot of statutes directed against a faith, and the injustice of which but makes the people more and more determined in their resistance to them.

Do the churchmen never stop to think that but for Christianity we should never hav had Mormonism; that its victims are people made superstitious, and therefore easy dupes to preachers of supernaturalism, by the older faith; that when Mormons become Infidels they do not believe in polygamy; and that the best way to suppress Mormonism is by converting the Mormons to Rationalism?

Persecution of Jews by Jews.

Tuesday, September 23d, at sundown began the Jewish Day of the Atonement, called Yom Kippur, for short. It is the annual period of Jewish humiliation, and on this day the year must be reviewed and forgivness asked for all sins against Jehovah. This ceremony, anciently, was a sort of confessional, which, with pagan additions, has developed into the Romish confessional. The day brings all Hebrews to their synagogs. Orthodox and reformers, high and low, rich and poor, good and bad, observe the day with fasting and hours of prayer. No business is conducted and all food is abstained from. Some of their customs are still permeated with the lowest forms of superstition. The day before the Day of Atonement the strict, old-fashioned, orthodox Hebrews provide a cock, which they send to be killed. The person whose property it is takes the fowl by the legs, and with his uplifted hands swings it nine times above the heads of himself and his family, and at the same time prays to God that the sins they hav been guilty of during the year may enter the body of the chicken.

There are in this city, however, a few thousand Jews who hav renounced their religion, without taking on any other superstition. Their "prophet" is John Most, renowned as the Anarchist. These Jews made preparations to celebrate the day in another fashion. They had arranged to hire the Labor Lyceum in Myrtle avenue, Brooklyn, in which to carry on their festivities, as they were unable to secure a suitable meeting-place in this city, and John Most was to speak. This fact became known several days before the event, and there arose protests from the religious Jews of Brooklyn against having their holy day ridiculed and desecrated. Those who were in charge of the meeting, with a view to allaying this storm of objections, announced that Most's name had been taken from the list of speakers, and that the Rev. Hugh Pentecost would speak in his place. The orthodox Jews, however, still protested, and attempted to obtain from the courts injunctions preventing the proprietors of the Labor Lyceum from letting the place for such purposes. The courts refused, and the Jews, with Coroner Levy at their head, went to Mayor Chapin yesterday morning. The result was that an order was issued that the Anarchist Jews were not to be allowed to meet in the Labor Lyceum, and that the doors of the hall should be closed and guarded by policemen, and that a large force of police should be on hand to carry out the order and prevent the Jews from congregating.

What the Jews proposed to do is outlined by their tickets, printed in Hebrew, but translated in the Sun:

"Grand Yom Zom Kippur ball.
"With theater.
"Arranged with consent of all new rabbis of liberty.
"Koll Nydre night and day.
"In the year 6651, after the invention of the Jewish idols, and 1890, after the birth of the false messiah, in the Brooklyn Labor Lyceum, 61–67 Myrtle street, Brooklyn.
"The Koll Nydre will be offered by John Most.
"Music, dancing, buffet, 'Marseillaise' and other hymns against Satan."

"Koll Nydre," is the name of the ceremony which plays the principal part in the celebration of Yom Kippur. One of the Jews described the proposed proceeding to a Sun reporter. "Our program for to-night," he said, "was to hav a farce performed on the stage, sing Russian songs, hav recitations, and dancing, and eating. Mr. Pentecost was to be the only speaker, and I hav telegraphed him now not to come over. Everything was in readiness, and we were prepared to hav a jolly time by ourselvs. I came here, and was confronted with the greatest outrage that could be perpetrated in a free country. This hall had been ordered by the mayor to be kept closed until to-morrow night. I asked the captain on what grounds, under what law, this was done. He didn't know; he was simply carrying out his instructions. Do you know who instigated this shameful thing? It was Moses May, the millionaire butcher, who wants to appear before the poor Jews as a sincere believer in their faith so that they will consider his meat 'kosher' and buy it in preference to other meat. Do you suppose the police would hav stopped us if we were not poor and helpless? Why don't they stop other meetings that they are opposed to? This affair was not arranged out of spite or with the intention of ridiculing the Jewish or any other religion. We are not children. We wanted to enlighten our people and show them what a true God is like and show them the God that the orthodox Jews worship. We issued a circular in which we imitated the prayer of the Jews. We asked God to abolish poverty, to make us all rich, to let the people run the railroads, not a few individuals. Dr. Richard Gottheil called at my house and asked me to suppress this circular. Of course I refused."

The gist of the matter is that the meeting was prevented by Coroner Levy, a political Jew of New York, to oblige his coreligionists, and make himself "solid" with them for a reëlection. Mayor Chapin has been guilty of using his office to oblige a brother politician, for even the police could not see where their power to stop the performance came from, and as the reporters naïvely put it, "seemed to sympathize with the Anarchists, and treated the few that gathered with more kindness and courtesy than they usually pay to people whom they may club with impunity."

The mayor of Brooklyn bases his action, he alleges, upon a call printed in the Pioneer of Freedom, a Hebrew journal, but as he had to depend for knowledge of its contents upon a translation, obtained by Coroner Levy, he had no means of knowing what it really contained. The translator deliberately and mendaciously inserted whole sentences, as was known the next day, when a reliable translation was made. Here is the circular, with the interpolations in italic:

"This company feel it their duty to celebrate the coming atonement evening and day, namely, the eve of the 23d and 24th of this month, in Labor Lyceum (a hall at 61 Myrtle street, Brooklyn), by eating, drinking, dancing, promenading, and speeches relating to Anarchism and the use of dy- namite and powder. The prophets of old preached and admonished in the name of God, in whom their followers pretended to believe, but we openly and frankly proclaim that God never existed. There is no God, and God will never be. In the name of freedom we mock the Jewish religion. As true revolutionists we fight against religion, the state, private and public property. These three things must be destroyed. Against religion, as well as against public and private property, we enter an open contest—a contest not through politics. We desire to throw off the yoke of the state, under whose weight we lie, by means of powder and dynamite, which we intend to use against religion and public and private property. We will hav a ball on Atonement day for the purpose of ridiculing your God. If your God is deaf, if he is sleeping, or conversing with some one, let our Atonement ball awake him. Let the tones of our music tear his ears open. Let our revolutionary speeches with dynamite and powder interrupt his conversations.

"Last year the Jews of New York took their God to the police department and to the coroner, but this year you poor Jews will take your God and religion to the cemetery. The experience which we had in New York city taught us the lesson to go to Brooklyn. The evening prayer will be: 'We will take the capitalist in the right hand and religion in the left hand, and say they both shall go to the devil by means of the use of dynamite and powder.' The closing prayer will be: 'Anarchy in the right hand and revolution and dynamite in the left; God never was, is, or ever will be.'

"A very interesting theatrical piece will be played, which was composed expressly for Atonement day. It will begin simultaneously with the services in the synagogs."

The good orthodox Jews deliberately committed forgery, perjury, and fraud to attain their object. They lied, they knew they lied, and they must hav known that soon the world would know that they lied. They went ahead, depending upon the popular prejudice against Anarchists to shield them.

But if the circular had been as fully charged with dynamite and powder as alleged, the case, if it should ever come before the courts, will involve, says the Sun, the question, Has the mayor or any other public official the right to prevent a number of men from holding a meeting? The law under which the mayor is supposed to hav acted is as follows:

"SEC. 451. Unlawful Assemblies.—Whenever three or more persons:

"1. Assemble with intent to commit any unlawful act by force; or

"2. Assemble with intent to carry out any purpose in such a manner as to disturb the public peace, or

"3. Being assembled, attempt, or threaten any act tending toward a breach of the peace or an injury to person or property, or any unlawful act. Such an assembly is unlawful, and every person participating therein, by his presence, aid, or instigation, is guilty of a misdemeanor. But this section shall not be construed as to prevent the peaceful assembling of persons for lawful purposes of protest or petition."

There is no law regarding assemblies which it is expected are going to be unlawful. In cases where there is the slightest reason to suppose that there will be a violation of the law, it has always been customary to hav a large force of police on hand to anticipate trouble and break up the meeting should such a violation occur. But to prevent the possibility of anything at all turning up, by simply preventing the meeting from being held, is a step which is invasiv of liberty. Commenting upon the suppression of the meeting the Sun, which is the only daily paper denouncing the outrage, says:

"The Constitution of the United States guarantees the freedom of speech and the right of the people peaceably to assemble.

"The constitution of the state of New York declares that 'every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right.'

"Until the right of free speech has been abused, no crime has been committed. No matter how unpleasant or violent or vile is the program announced for a public meeting, nor how despicable are the people who intend to assemble, nor how offensiv to public decency they are expected to make themselvs, the time for the police to interfere is when the law is broken, not before.

"The suppression of the meeting of the Infidel and Anarchistic Jews of Brooklyn by the police of that city, under verbal orders from Mayor Chapin, after the courts had refused to prevent the meeting by injunction, was an extraordinary proceeding.

"What evidence had the mayor or the police that the announced intention of the Anarchist Jews to talk dynamite and to burlesque religion had not been abandoned at the last moment? And, supposing it had been abandoned, was not an outrage committed? Were not people of the state of New York deprived of a constitutional right?

"It implies no sympathy with dynamite talk or vile jesting on sacred subjects to maintain that the only duty of the mayor and police was to warn these people and to watch them, and to arrest them if they violated any law.

'To close the doors of their hall and the mouths of their speakers before any law had been broken was a colossal blunder, no matter how good the intentions of the authority responsible for the order to the police."

In Brooklyn the matter has been freely discussed since by the politicians, and even by them the opinion was expressed that the mayor had overstepped his authority in prohibiting the meeting until such expressions from the speakers as would tend to incite trouble had been made. The executiv committee of the Labor Lyceum Association of Brooklyn, which organization owns the Labor Lyceum, held a secret session on Yom Kippur night and declared the action of Mayor Chapin arbitrary. Although the strictest secresy was manifested regarding the proceedings, it was learned by a Herald reporter that civil proceedings are likely to be commenced against the city. The speeches were bitter in their tone, and the municipal authorities were denounced for not waiting to find out whether at the meeting speeches relating to the use of dynamite were made. We hope the suit will be pushed and the Brooklyn authorities taught a lesson in religious liberty and the orthodox Jews one on the sin of bearing false witness.

Of this action of the Jews in demanding the suppression by law of their religious opponents, what shall be said? It surely will not raise them in the estimation of decent people, nor will it win them sympathy for their own sufferings by Christian persecution. They are even now appealing for aid against the wicked decrees of the Russian government, and also crying religious persecution because insurance companies discriminate against them in issuing fire policies on property occupied by them, and because the Christian landlords of summer resorts hav kicked them out of the hotels. Yet, persecuted and discriminated against as they are, they turn around and invoke the aid of the police to persecute their own brethren who hav voluntarily left their religious fold!

The action of the authorities is unwarranted. They hav no legal right to suppress anything but disorderly meetings, and this meeting had not even begun.

Why don't they suppress some Catholic or Protestant gatherings because things are said at them which hurt the feelings of one or the other of the sects?

A Humane, Christian Gentleman.

Brick Pomeroy uses over a column of the latest issue of his paper to giv Holy John Wanamaker a certificate of good character. Mr. Pomeroy met the postmaster-general on his recent visit to Washington in the interest of Moses Harman. "Mr. Wanamaker," certifies Mr. Pomeroy, "is a humane, Christian gentleman of great business capacity." Just so. An article in the evening Sun a few days ago fully illustrates this. It is headed, "Wanamaker, the Friend of Labor," and is as follows:

"Pecksniff Gradgrind Wanamaker has the following advertisment in the Philadelphia morning papers of Thursday, September 18th:

"'Here's a chemise. Cambric, in large sizes:

2 1-4 yards cambric at 11c	25c.
1-4 yard Hamburg at 30	8c.
2 yards Hamburg edging at 5c	10c.
Cotton	3c.
	46c.

"'That's the close, careful cost. Our price is only 50c. Would you do the work for 4c.?'

"Mr. Gradgrind Wanamaker is a man of facts, hard facts. He invites his customers to consider whether they could make a chemise for four cents. Their time would be spent more usefully at their trade, or taking healthful recreation, or attending the prayer-meeting. There is no profit, in Gradgrind Wanamaker's opinion, in making chemises at four cents apiece. So the throngs of artisans' wives and clerks' wives who buy their dry goods in Wanamaker's store are advised of the great bargains in chemises to be had there.

"At whose expense do the women of Philadelphia buy such bargains? Mr. Wanamaker has no longer any white slaves at Berlin. As a patriot he now uses only domestic labor. He pays his seamstresses four cents, less his margin of profit, for each chemise they make. Owing to his exertions, new chemises are placed within the reach of all but the very poorest members of the community. What matter if these very poorest be the same women whom he employs to make chemises in order that he may pile them up on his bargain counter? No one ever studied the interests of the working classes with better results than Pecksniff Gradgrind Wanamaker.

"If an ordinary merchant advertised his wares in this fashion, one might be consoled by the thought that he was simply lying, and that he was really understating the price of his seamstresses' labor in order to giv his bargains an enhanced value in the eyes of consumers. But Pecksniff Gradgrind Wanamaker is shut out from this miserable alternativ. He is a humble and devout Christian. He could not be guilty of the sin of telling lies to gain trade. To represent the chemises as costing less for labor than the real amount paid for them would be equivalent to obtaining money under false pretenses.

"No. Pecksniff Wanamaker, who teaches little children on Sundays to pray for their daily bread, givs bread, and not much else, to his seamstresses on week days; the city supplies them with the water to wash it down. Pecksniff Wanamaker subscribes liberally out of his margin of profit on four-cent labor to send flannel waistcoats and other luxuries to the nativs of Central Africa. Wanamaker's smiling Pecksniff mask is always on when his face is turned toward the public; the grinning Gradgrind skull is reserved for his seamstresses and other employees.

"But even Wanamaker must sometimes be caught with his mask off. So on this occasion he lets the whole world by a signed advertisment see him as he is. In a moment of forgetfulness the Pecksniff mask is thrown off, the four-cent labor confession escapes him, and the unmasked features of Gradgrind Wanamaker are exposed to view."

We do not doubt that Mr. Wanamaker is a Christian; that he is a humane gentleman requires, in our opinion, more than Mr. Pomeroy's word to establish. We like better the notions of a famous apostle of Freethought who said he would not wear a shirt for which the poor woman that made it had not received just and full compensation.

Four cents for making a large-sized cambric garment! Yet of such as Wanamaker is the kingdom of heaven.

Let's go to sheol.

WE record with sorrow that Wm. Holgate, of Mauston, Wis., died September 13th. Mr. Holgate was born near Halifax, Yorkshire, England, Oct. 30, 1812 He came to this country and landed in Boston April 18, 1848. In 1852 he moved to Chicago, where he lived about two years, then moved to Marengo, Ill., in which place he lived thirteen years, and came to Mauston Dec. 17, 1866, and has been a resident there since that time. He was married to Mrs. Elizabeth Rowe Sept. 1, 1855. His wife, two sons, and two daughters survive him. His funeral was held at his late residence Monday afternoon, J. L. Potter, of Wonewoc, Spiritualistic lecturer, conducting. He read an address from the Truth Seeker Collection, hymns were sung by the choir, and the remains were conveyed to Mauston cemetery for interment.

JUDGE THAYER last week decided the case of the street pedlers of Philadelphia who were arrested for selling the "Kreutzer Sonata." In his opinion he says the book possesses very little dramatic interest or literary merit. In the first he is wrong, in the second right. The book is very dramatic, but is by no means pleasing reading. Tolstoi has drawn his inductions as to sex union from a class of people who are not yet civilized, who are partial animals, with no idea of the equality of woman or of her equal rights in marriage, and naturally he has written brutally. The remedy, in his view, is the old asceticism of monkery, which, of course, would destroy the family, and in the end lead to the licentiousness of those times when Christianity was lived as well as preached. In his concluding remarks, Judge Thayer said: "The work may be offensiv to our opinions and convictions, just as others are which are daily sold in our bookstores without objection or challenge from anybody, but it cannot be justly said to be of an obscene or lewd character, nor is it, either in its sentiments or language, in any degree calculated to minister to corrupt or licentious practices, or to gratify lewd desires or to encourage depravity in any form. The court was reminded upon the argument that the czar of Russia and the post-office officials of the United States hav condemned this book as an unlawful publication; that the former has prohibited its sale within his dominions, and the latter hav forbidden its transmission through the mails. Without disparaging in any degree the respect due to these high officials within their respectiv spheres, I can only say that neither of them has ever been recognized in this country as a binding authority in questions of either law or literature. The defendants hav committed no offense against the laws, and are therefore discharged." This is good, but there is a paragraph in the opinion which betrays a narrowness one would not expect after the foregoing. "Every man," he says, "has the right under such a government as ours to discuss such questions, either orally or in print, if he does so in a proper and becoming manner, and does not in doing so violate the decencies of life. He may call in question and argue against any received doctrin of the Christian faith, if he uses in doing so proper and becoming language, but if one should introduce into such a discussion blasphemous language or ideas, or obscene, lewd, or indecent thoughts or words, or should make his description the occasion for reviling and scoffing at the most sacred things, or speaking of them in a profane, abusiv, or indecent manner, he would unquestionably be liable to be indicted and punished therefor." Pennsylvania has a very pretty blasphemy law, and legally Judge Thayer may be right as to penalties for blasphemous language; but will he undertake to imprison all the scoffers at sacred things in his state? If so, the legislature will hav to build more jails and penitentiaries. As for indecent language against the Christian faith, none can be used that would more justly fall under judicial displeasure than quotations from the "sacred" book upon which that faith is founded. But when did the Christian faith become so allied with the state that one must be finically circumspect in discussing its doctrins? Judge Thayer seems to labor under the impression that Christianity owns the world, and that to dissent from any of its doctrins is a privilege which it graciously grants, but which no one has the natural right to do. About three hundred years ago that sort of talk was more in harmony with facts than it is now.

Letters from Friends.

CHADRON, NEB., Sept. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: We like the paper better without the illustrations. M. E. SMITH & Co.

COUNCIL VALLEY, IDA., Sept. 3, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please continue my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am a school-teacher here. I like your paper so well I cannot do without it. J. T. TOWNLEY.

CHEWSVILLE, MD., Sept. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2 for the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book." Send the book as soon as ready. I will inform the late inquirer that the poem entitled, "The God and Devil of Orthodoxy," can be found in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Oct. 22, 1881. JNO. H. HARP.

DAYTON, O., Sept. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4 for two copies of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book." I hav no doubt the book will hav a very large circulation. It is only by the free circulation of Liberal ideas that an influence and power is created that saves us from the cruelties of religious persecutions and at the same time serves as an aid to evolution.

Truly yours, J. A. WALTERS.

CENTRE BELPRE, O., Sept. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find my check, for which I wish you to mail one copy of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." This is the second "Pictorial Text-Book" I hav ordered, and I may order more. It is grand. I subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER when it was published in Illinois, and hav taken it ever since. Life would scarcely be worth living without it. PARKER LEWIS.

LONDON, ONT., Sept. 15, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Please inclosed find $5.25 for my lease of that paper which I cannot be without, the cartoon book, and the ANNUAL for 1890. I will also take one of the Bible cartoon books when they are finished. There is nothing like them to counteract the impression made on the minds of children by that fabulous book. Superstition dies hard—very slow, but sure. Hold the fort. JOSEPH ALLASTER.

BROWNVILLE, IND., Sept. 15, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav sat down to write for the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book. Designs by Watson Heston." I hav been a subscriber of the good old TRUTH SEEKER for twelve or fourteen years, and want it to be circulated. I hav tried to get subscribers, but many are afraid to take it for fear that it will hurt their business. I am an Atheist of the first water. I was reared a solid Presbyterian up to nineteen. Infant damnation was too strong. I want Reason and not superstition. JOHN A. REYNOLDS.

EMMETTSBURG, IA., Sept. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find draft for $10—$6 of which is in payment of the three "Pictorial Text-Books" already received, and $4 for two more which we hav sold to other good men that are interested in the good cause. We think the work is immense. What is the matter with Heston? We do not like THE TRUTH SEEKER quite as well without the pictures. Get Heston at work as soon as possible.

Yours truly, T. J. PROUTY AND C. E. COHOON.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Sept. 11, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The two "Pictorial Text-Books" came to hand O. K. You can send the other three. I will keep one as a sample to get orders. The book must be seen to be appreciated. All that hav seen the book speak well of it—even church-members, that are not hidebound. I believe the book will hav a good run after a little time. I will try to get orders for the book. I prize the work highly. The book is worth double what is charged for it. With much regard for the success of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I subscribe myself, Its friend and patron, R. BUTTERFIELD.

SIGNAL, O., Sept. 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav given to several of my Liberal friends to read the truth seekers' journal. They admire the same very much. We hav several Freethinkers in this part of the country, and I think if we would hav some intellectual speaker come and giv courage to some of us, he could organize us.

As the most part of our Freethinkers are cowards and are afraid to say their view of religion, I hope some one will come to our aid and organize us, and keep our young friends from being dragged to the torturing hell of superstitious ignorance. E. M. GEIGER.

WALLA WALLA, WASH., Sept. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I take this opportunity of acknowledging the receipt of my "Pictorial Text-Book," and it is a gem and a treat. The first evening and afternoon that I received it, I think a score of persons must hav looked at it, and all, some of them Christians (not fanatics), were loud in its praise. A good many took down your address, and I am sure a great many orders will come from here. I hav kept for ten years the largest oyster and chop house in this city. My place is patronized by lawyers, doctors, and business and professional men, in fact by the best class of people here, and as my place is open all night, the "Text-Book" was being looked at and read by these men all night. For myself and wife's part, if you would kindly thank Mr. Watson Heston for the picture where C. B. Reynolds's kind and intelligent features are beaming at us in front of his tent, throwing away pearls indeed, you would do us a great favor. Next to that is the pair of pictures, "The Illusions of Child and Manhood." But they are all good. ALVIN OLSON.

SPOKANE FALLS, WASH., Sept. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for renewal to the grand TRUTH SEEKER. I hav read THE TRUTH SEEKER for three years off and on, and I can safely say it is the most instructiv journal in America. I take Fritankaren also. It is a good paper, worthy of assistance from all Liberal-minded people. This city is big enough for a strong Secular Union, and I cannot see why one has not been organized. Will some subscriber here drop a card for me at the post-office, and we could try to hav some Liberal lecturer come here and help us organize.

The Washington Secular Union is doing some good work on the other side of the Cascades. And with Mr. Reynolds at the head of the little army we ought to succeed. Wishing you success, and Heston speedy return, I am,

Yours sincerely, JOHN E. WELIN.

POCATELLO, IDA., Sept. 19, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I received the "Pictorial Text-Book" some time ago. I would not take $25 for it if it could not be replaced again. A good number hav spoken of getting it this fall. I hope they will. It is a fine educator. It lies on my center-table along with the Bible, and the old and young's first choice is the "Pictorial Text-Book."

Inclosed please find clipping from an Eastern paper which runs as follows:

Geologists assert that if the continents and the bottom of the ocean were graded down to a uniform level the whole world would be covered with water a mile deep, so much greater is the depression of the ocean bed than the elevation of the existing land.

Is there any truth in it? C. PAULSAN.

[In the case supposed the water would cover the globe to the depth of about one mile and a half.—ED. T. S.]

NORFOLK, NEB., Sept. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 for the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." I hope you will get the Bible pictures in book form. With these two books at hand a Freethinker's library will be more complete.

To show the means that some church people use in order to rob the ignorant people of their money, for the benefit of the church, inclosed I send an item which was published in a paper here a few days ago called the Norfolk Daily News. They may just as well put in some gambling tables and let the rake-off go to the benefit of the church. One is just as honorable as the other. If it is not, I would like some one to tell me the difference. C. F. W. MARQUARDT.

The ladies' guild of Trinity church hav secured the services of a band of nativ imported Egyptian gypsies from Morocco to tell the fortunes of the people at prices varying according to the fortune expected, the proceeds to be for the benefit of the church. The vacant store-room in the Mast block has been secured, and there the gypsies will appear during fair week.

RICHMOND, ILL., Sept. 9, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I received the pictorial book all right, and am much pleased with it. I hav lived here since 1846; hav taken an activ part in the business of the county and neighborhood; hav taken the paper printed in this place for twenty-five years; hav always supposed that it was in favor of free press and free speech until, quite recently, I suspected that they were not all right. So I wrote a piece for them to print, and they would not print it It was entitled, "Do the church and Sunday-schools, as they are conducted at the present time, hav a tendency to do away with crime?" It hit them in a tender place, and they came out in their paper with a long piece "giving me fits." And I hav no way of answering them, so it leaves me in a fix. I suppose I could answer them through a Liberal paper, but they would never read it, and I do not think there are any taken here. I am an old farmer, but I think I hav as good a right to think as if I had D.D., LL.D., attached to the end of my name.

J. C. KILGORE.

KIMBALL, DAK., Sept. 12, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed money for Helen Gardener's book, "Men, Women, and Gods," and for the balance you may send me the grand old paper. It is my Bible now. It is but a short time since I evoluted by its teachings. It is with great pleasure that I perusc the letter department. In it I find the names of some of my old friends in the East, from whence I emigrated, that hav come to their senses, as I hav done in my old age (being over sixty), so you see I am not too old to learn yet.

My advancement in Liberal views and emancipation from superstitious traditions is due to those kind friends who placed your TRUTH SEEKERS in my hands. I will state that after reading them I gave them to a friend to circulate in his neighborhood. A few days ago he told me that when he took them home his wife told him she would burn them, but, just like Eve of olden times, she had to nibble from the tree of knowledge, and lo! her eyes were opened, and she advised her husband to subscribe for it.

If the friends hav any Liberal literature lying around loose that they will send here, we hav place for it.

We are having a very exciting political campaign, four parties trying to capture the reins of the state of South Dakota, with, I think, the Independent Alliance in the lead. Many articles are read at these campaign meetings and literary gatherings at the district school-houses from the G. O. P. (Grand Old Paper) THE TRUTH SEEKER. Last winter I pushed to the front every article that was favorable to the elevation and liberation of humanity from the slavery of priestcraft and kingcraft.

Three things I hav long desired to cast my vote for hav reached and passed us—abolition of human slavery, prohibition of the rum demon, and equal suffrage. I believe we should giv to our mothers, sisters, and daughters the same rights that we ask for ourselvs. This South Dakota will giv this fall's election. After we get that, the next on my program is to secure for president our R. G. Ingersoll.

Yours for truth and humanity, JOHN MCKEE.

ROSLYN, WASH., Sept. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6 85, for which send me one more copy of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," and use the rest of the order for books and subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER as in list inclosed. Five copies of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" hav been received, one by mail and four by express. The subscribers are more than pleased with them.

The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is exactly what its title indicates. There is a text in every cartoon, and it can be understood by the greatest theological numskull at a glance. I can say that the books that hav been received hav already acted as fertilizers to Freethought, and they hav strengthened those that languished for refreshment.

Mr. Heston's portrait adorns the book. His features are those of a mental temperament, and I feel assured that Mr. Heston's work will do as much for Liberalism as our orators. We expect to hav Mr. Remsburg here some time in October to giv a lecture that will giv the sunshine of peace to many minds.

Two years ago when I first came here not a single copy of a Freethought paper came to this place, and I forget whether there was a Freethought book of any kind here. Now a number of papers come here, and books hav been purchased and circulated. And now the climax is to be capped by the arrival of Mr. John E. Remsburg. HENRY BEICHLING.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., Sept. 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The great conflict between belief and unbelief is still on, and will continue as long as life lasts on this earth. I am rather inclined to believe life may become extinct, but the earth never. The strong probability is that this earth, with other physical planets, probably existing, though not positivly demonstrated, always was and always will be. Life and death are getting less mysterious than in the dark, dreary past. What agencies must we giv credit to for our present enlightenment? Science and the revelations of nature. Freethinkers are getting more and more enlightened, almost in spite of ourselvs, but unfortunately millions are yet, and will liv and die, in mental slavery. It seems as though those millions are very well satisfied with faith. No doubt it is a comfort to them to believe in eternal reward and punishment. I would be the last person to try to induce persons to change the deep-rooted convictions of their life.

I believe in the school of individualism—that every man, woman, and child existing is actually a free individual being. If all only realized this truth, mental liberty would necessarily come from individual thought and bravery. I venture to say that nine tenths of all Freethinkers hav become such by thinking for themselvs. What is done voluntarily is the most pleasing and reliable. I do not certainly recognize a man or woman to be Freethinkers till they are avowed and outspoken in the cause of justice and truth. Any man or woman who claim to be Liberals who are afraid to express their own opinions in what they honestly believe or do not believe, and refuse to contribute what they can afford to giv to the cause, are not Freethinkers. The Liberal ranks are pretty much like the Christian ranks, so many on both sides not proving loyal and sincere to their profession of belief. Some persons can be read like a book; they are trustful and consistent, and can always be relied upon. Many others cannot be read at all; they cannot be placed, and so they must remain the ignorant, indifferent, neutral, do-nothing-at-all people that are entirely out of calculation.

I cannot see or understand how people can be neutral or indifferent in the mighty issue of life and death. No middle ground can be taken. It is not like politics. Make an independent stand, as all voters should, and be no more the slaves of partyism than of superstition. We must either die in mental freedom, or die in mental fear of an imaginary hell. Of course all unbelievers are open to conviction. They desire everlasting life as much as Christians. They are not enemies of God, if such a being exists. The Freethinkers are enlisted for the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. The whole issue is the truth versus delusion. The position of the Agnostic and Positivist is the most rational and honest, though millions of Christians believe honestly in their faith. The love of truth is the love of justice. The evidence reveals the truth. The universe does not care for our happiness or woe, our coming and going. Conditions and circumstances rule our destiny. The fact that no prayers are answered, that justice is not providentially sustained, let alone all the other inequalities and injustice in life, ought to prove positivly to the impartial, sensible mind that there is no God to help us in our troubles and misfortunes. Poor struggling victims of cruel fatalism we are. Our only known savior is the truth. The truth we worship, the inevitable, the inexorable. T. J. CONNERS.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Sept. 22, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read the "Kreutzer Sonata." When Pope Wanamaker issued his bull, registering the book in the Index Expurgatorius, forbidding its transmission by the mails, I at once procured a copy. On reading it, I was unable to find the indecency which was the ground of Pope Wanamaker's order. Has it come to this, that an arbitrary decision and order of this character shall become the governing principle of the post-office department? Is the literature of the world to be passed upon by a postmaster-general? And is his ipse dixit to determin what shall be transmitted through the mail? I had supposed that this official's duty covered only the administration of the post-office, and that beyond this he was no more than an ordinary citizen. But it seems I was mistaken; no, not mistaken, for this act was purely a usurpation, an exercise of arbitrary power, the outcome of bigotry, the inspiration of that despotism which is the concomitant of the church and its religion. We cannot tell where such a stretch of power will end. To-day "Kreutzer Sonata" is under the ban; to-morrow it may be something else, and the day after, still another work.

If this meddling is unchecked, it will not be long before the state will be subordinated to the church, and we will be dominated by psalm-singing hypocrits and church-going knaves. It is time this Comstockism was eliminated from the government. It is mischievous all through. Will citizens think the matter over—moreover, let their political action take such a direction as shall at once crush out this attempt to throttle the liberty of the press and the right of the people to use the mails? In one or more congressional districts cannot a member, or members, of Congress be elected who will stand up and act for the right?

Indecency! What and where is the standard which shall determin the question? After I had read Tolstoi, I took my Bible and read the Song of Solomon, one of the canonical books of the Old Testament. I wonder if Pope Wanamaker ever reads this precious Song to his Sunday-school, especially the seventh chapter. The heading of this chapter is this, "The Graces of the Church." In my Bible I hav made a reference, and in the margin penciled this: "The above may be very pious, but to me it reads like an amorous ditty." So of much of the other portions, but the compilers hav, by their marginal and chapter headings, applied the bawdy stuff to the church. But these headings do not alter the character of the Song, or make it anything more or less than the rhapsodic utterances of a man who emphatically had women on the brain, just what might be expected of a man as "muchly" married and "muchly" concubined as was Solomon. Yet this erotic composition is given a place in the holy Bible; is pure, clean, and wholesome, a part of God's inspiration to the race, while "Kreutzer Sonata" is too indecent to be allowed transmission in the mail. Out on such hypocrisy; away with such brazen-faced tampering with the rights of the citizen; down with such despotism, which ever stands ready, especially when coupled with churchly religion, to prevent free thought and free discussion on such questions and topics as may enlarge mental liberty and extirpate spiritual tyranny.

WILLIAM FOSTER, JR.

LEXINGTON, KY., Sept. 13, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: An advance in civilization is hoped for by those who "hope against hope." Still, there are always saving influences to prevent the human heart from being corrupted to the core, corruption being a departure from the noblest impulses of nature. The proclivities of life are too sacred to be distrusted. Low in the scale of being, faults and virtues are intensified to the verge of lunacy. The dog has an immaterial conception of the soul of man, which he adores with an honest madness. Your dog would die for you. The man is more crafty. He worships his trinity—mammon, himself, and Jesus. He has faith in the Jesus who is to settle his bills and pull his chestnuts out of the fire. He worships him with greedy fervor, hoping to enjoy luxuries with him to all eternity. Blessed are the poor in spirit, who are so deftly robbed and insulted that they would rather starve than ask a Christian for justice. Holy charity is ostentatious, giving $50 for a church toy, refusing a poor woman ten cent's worth of provisions (a fact).

The usual toys and mummeries of the Sabbath are not so precious to the masses as the contemplation and study of works of art, those heavenly materializations of the divinest dreams of genius.

The Socialist is groping his way to the light. He will furnish an antidote to monopolism, perhaps, and giv an industrious man, a good manager in business, a chance to better his condition. Men forced into a low plane of existence will yield to surroundings. Behold the fate of the Albigenses—infants brained, young and old murdered for their opinions, a priest praising God for the same in a chapel near by. What chance had they for civilization? What chance hav the poor now, squeezed out of every habitable place to furnish the wealthy Christian with one palace to liv in and another in which to worship a fabulous God? Cannot small portions of land be held sacred to them in the heart of a cruel, wolfish civilization? Or shall we wait for Jesus to reform the people, him whose life and death were scenes of bloody contention, disaster, and mob law? Science is rather slow, but what else can bring relief? Science is now a star. It will not be a sun until self-sacrifice is often substituted for self-indulgence. A vicious civilization is an exotic, which will run back in the scale. Barbaric grandeur is all we hav to boast of. The poor must assert themselvs and talk no more about Jesus being the king of the land, thus confirming the bloody restrictions which strangle reason and common sense.

Secular education is our only salvation, presenting a shield against the dangerous and vulgar vagaries used by religion for the purpose of entangling and capturing the public mind. Nothing can bring about reform and create a soul under the ribs of death but the triumph of a great principle. The burden of it is this: Our country exists for the benefit of the poor as well as the rich. Dignify yourself and the divinity will grow within you, and you will soon find yourselvs obeying no laws except those you hav helped to make.

Will you please publish the date of Mr. Bennett's trip around the world? I am in total darkness, and know not what to do. ALHAZA.

[Mr. Bennett departed July 30, 1881, and returned July 30, 1882.—ED. T. S.]

COLLEGE POINT, N. Y., Sept. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Although born in Switzerland and still in connection with friends there, I read for the first time in your Sept. 6, 1890, TRUTH SEEKER of the fact that the Swiss government has ordered to excise the story of the Swiss hero, William Tell, out of the school-books. I can reverence William Tell quite as well, true or not true; still, I prefer him to pose as a myth, as such a step is toward progress in other fields. But from the exclusion of Tell's heroic deeds out of the Swiss school-books to the annihilation of the Jesus Christ story, is a large step, and the last will not be likely to occur soon, especially in the poor, priest-ridden Switzerland, where there is no demand, or hardly any, for so wild a step as the separation of church and state.

The item clipped from the Boston Post is too good to be let pass. The writer argues in such a naive way as to force upon one the question, Is it a child that argues thus or the editor of the Boston Post? This argument reminds me of a Catholic friend who doubtfully asked me, when I pointed to him the absurdities of the Bible, "How is it then, that, traveling in Palestine, one finds a city Jerusalem, a village Nazareth, a mount of Calvary, a Jordan river, etc.?" Returning to the Boston Post, she is wrong in asking, How is it, then, that in Altorf, canton Uri, there are two statues, one of Tell, the other of his son Walther? This is untrue, a misrepresentation. As a Swiss-American, who has been in Altorf very frequently, and who knows the locality well, I can vouch for my statement. I was there last year when traveling in Europe, and hav taken several photographic views in Altorf, of which I inclose the most important one of the Tell statue—the only one in Altorf. There is no special statue for his son. The Tell statue is made of common hardened plaster of paris, and was designed by Sculptor Siegfried, and used at the Swiss general shooting festivities in Zurich, 1857. The committee turned it over to the Altorf authorities, who posted the statue on the alleged place where Tell is supposed to hav stood when shooting the apple off his boy's head. The statue was erected there in 1861. About one hundred and fifty paces distant stands a fountain with a statue of Besler, a magistrate of the town, erected on the supposed site of the lime-tree by which Tell's child stood while awaiting his father's arrow. Johannes von Müller, the Swiss historian, says the tower behind said fountain is the exact spot, but research proved that the tower was built before Tell's adventures. The same uncertainty and contradictions are here as in all such histories, which hav been written down by historians from hearsay, just like the Bible. I hope the latter will share the fate of Tell.

The Tell myth would never hav come to such a fame had not the German Shakspere, Friedrich von Schiller, written his master-work, "William Tell." Only after his drama was known and played, Swiss people began to interest themselvs for William Tell. This is how it came, my dear Boston Post, that you find now one Tell statue in Altorf, one Tell chapel and one Tell and Schiller stone on the Lake of the Four Cantons, and one chapel in Kussnacht.

HERMANN BUOHER, JR.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Sept. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I send you herewith an extract from a Catholic paper published at Independence, Tex., called the Colored Orphan and Messenger of the St. Peter Claver Society. The editor is at the head of a colored orphan asylum and school, and the extract shows the kind of instruction that may be looked for in Catholic parochial schools:

I select one instance only out of thousands because it is well authenticated, for it was quoted from St. Athanasius, patriarch of Alexandria, in the seventh council, and was listened to by the fathers with tears of compunction.

Beyrout, where this stupendous prodigy, or rather series of prodigies, occurred, is a city of Syria, on the confines of Tyre and Sidon, and dependent on Antioch.

A Christian resident of this city, having taken a house hard by the synagog, had hung over his bed a picture of our Lord painted by Nichodemus with his own hands. When the owner of this picture was dying, he left it to Gamaliel, who, in his turn, passed it to St. James, from whom it went to St. Simeon, who left to St. Zacheus. After this, it had been handed down as an heirloom from father to son until it came into the possession of the aforesaid Christian, to whom it belonged at the time when the prodigies I hav to tell of came to pass.

This man, being obliged to move to a larger house, forgot to take the picture with him, or rather, as St. Athanasius observes, God so disposed that he should leave it behind. His former residence having been, meanwhile, occupied by a Jew, the new tenant invited his friends to dinner with him, who, on seeing a picture so hateful to them, reproached him sharply and bitterly, but, as he alleged for his excuse his inadvertence, they were silenced for a time.

After dinner was ended, they laid an accusation against him before the chiefs of the synagog, who, assembling together a large crowd, went to the house of the culprit. There, on seeing the picture of our savior hanging on the wall, they were all enraged with the Jew for daring to keep that kind of picture in his house, and after loading him with abuse, they excommunicated him, as one guilty of an enormous crime, from the synagog. Then turning their rage and hate against Jesus Christ, they took down the picture and, influenced with devilish spite, they said to one another. "Let us heap upon it the same outrages as our forefathers inflicted upon him."

They then began, with one accord, to spit in its face, to smite it as hard as they could, to vomit forth against it the most impious blasphemies which they could suggest. They next drove sharp nails into the hands and feet, and having soaked a sponge in vinegar and gall, they pressed it in mockery and scorn upon the lips.

Finally, after many other outrages, they exclaimed: "We are told that our forefathers pierced Christ through the heart with a spear. We must take care then not to omit this particular insult." And without delay, one laying hold of a spear thrust it into the right side. Wonderful to relate, at this stroke the blood and water began to flow so profusely that in a few moments the whole floor was flooded. A water jar was called for by some of the miscreants, and holding it to the bleeding side they awaited the result of so strange an event. A large vessel having been procured forthwith and held to our savior's side, it soon filled up to the brim with the sacred stream. What unbelief could behold so amazing a prodigy and not confess itself worsted and overcome? Yet these wicked men were more than ever hardened, and more than ever insulted their own savior. "Let us take the jar," they said, "into our synagog, and gather together all the sick in the neighborhood in order to rub them with this blood. If they are not cured forthwith, we may say that this is another of those pretended miracles the followers of Christ are wont to boast of." They agreed to the proposal, hoping by this test to giv our savior the lie, and to discredit——

When I had copied thus far, the paper was snatched away by a Catholic who saw what I was doing, and though I hav made much exertion to find a duplicate to send you, I hav not been able to do so. The sequel, however, of the story is substantially this: All the sick who were rubbed with the blood were immediately healed, and the synagog were all converted and sent for the bishop of Antioch, were baptized, and had their synagog dedicated as a Christian church.

The "Pictorial Text-Books" all arrived. They are magnificent. ALMOND OWEN.

RED CANON, WYO., Sept. 4, 290.

MR. EDITOR: Once upon a time there was a comet. A boy saw it. It had a tail (the comet had a tail). The boy said he knew it had a tail, for he saw the tail. A man told him that the tail was nothing, but the observer denied this, saying that "nothing" was invisible, and to be visible the tail must be a something, a real material something, just as a donkey's tail is a real material tail. The comet moved westward. It went far beyond the limits of Neptune's orbit, and all the time its tail grew smaller and smaller, until at last it had scarcely any tail at all. Did the comet whisk his tail away in the long journey into interstellar space? Let us see. After a number of years the comet came back again. When astronomers first saw it, it was nearly tailless. Gradually, as it came nearer to the sun, the tail grew longer, and finally was as large as when first seen. The boy who declared that he knew that the tail was a part of the comet did not repeat his assertion. He had applied himself vigorously to the study of astronomy during the comet's long journey, and he was wont to say less frequently than before those two little words, "I know." Before, he had deemed it highly wise to utter them, but his wisdom led him to much thinking, much calculating. He trusted more to his calculus of mathematical deductions than to his eyes. He had learned that the coin that seemed lifted in the cup of water was not lifted; that the straight stick half in water was not bent. One day a man came to this astronomer and told him that he too was a man of science; that he had for twenty years devoted himself to the study of Spiritual philosophy.

"What hav you learned?" asked the astronomer.

Said the man, "I hav learned that there is a spiritual world beyond the natural of the common mind; and I hav also seen my father's ghost."

Then the astronomer asked the Spiritual philosopher if he was certain of these things.

"Yes," said the man, "I know them to be true, and when a man knows a thing, need he question any further?"

"Ah," said the astronomer, "when as a boy I entered this observatory I spoke as you speak. I told men that I knew that this and that was thus and so. Now my hair is gray. Only one night in twenty years hav I been away from this observatory. Yonder are the journals of my work"—and he pointed to a massiv pile of heavy books. "I hav been calculating all these years in this way"—and the astronomer handed the man a manuscript. It embraced a calculation by the method of least squares applied to finding the amount of possible error in the calculated distance of a fixed star.

The Spiritual philosopher glanced at it hastily and said, "In my profession I use no x's and y's and z's. The questions of our research require a peculiar mind. Few hav the gift of spiritual vision. By your method of least squares you hav been calculating the possible error in your observation and deduction. Now, I saw my father's ghost. About that there was no error; no need for the use of your method of least squares there. I know I saw it, and that is enough for me. When a man is gifted with spiritual vision he reaches the ultimatum of knowledge. He spans all science on magic wings of thought spirit-given. In it there is not work, in the character of work as done by you. The spirits guide me on; my mind is given up to them. No such weary plodding as you hav done compiling those vast books; inspiration has in one moment given me what years of toil and research could not giv. Ah, glad am I that I am not doomed to creep with only materialistic hands and feet and brain, but on celestial wings can fly through the vast infinities of science, knowing that I am a medium, a mind that floats between two worlds, the spirit world and this poor lump of clay called earth. Ah, my friend, turn the telescope of thy mind upward into the infinit blue of the spirit ethers. Then you shall grow wiser in an hour than by years of calculating toil, toying with the relations of x's, y's, and z's."

But the astronomer was unmoved. He touched not the tempting wine of thought the Spiritual philosopher had offered him. He was a temperate man, and turning to his calculations proceeded to determin the integral between the extreme limits of error concerning the distance of Arcturus.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Liv Not Alone.

A PLEA FOR ORGANIZATION.

Do you know what it is to liv alone
While hot suns scorch and rise and wane,
To forever stifle the inward groan,
To trample down grief, to smile at pain?

See you yon child sitting listless and dull,
With pale, wan cheek and tear-dimmed eye?
In some storm of grief this is only the lull,
She knows not philosophy but wishes to die.

The youth, until now so happy and gay,
Whispers low the fond words of his heart's deep devotion,
Like a stab in the dark is the cruel word, nay,
And he drinks to the dregs life's bitterest potion.

In that answer so softly and easily given
He catches a glimpse of the weary years,
Hears murmuring echoes of hopes madly riven,
Feels his radiant future shadowed with fears.

The cherished wife who with brave words has led
The one of her choice up the steep hill of fame,
To sleep in earth's bosom has silently fled;
To him night comes at noon, and life's never the same.

With thin, white locks framing a face once fair,
Muttering low 'twixt a sigh and a moan,
Sat a woman seemingly filled with care,
Murmuring, I hav lived and loved and toiled alone.

Oh, liv not alone while humanity's near!
To change desert to garden there's only one way,
To work, and together, each day in the year,
Our minds always yielding to reason's kind sway.

One leaf on a tree would create endless mirth,
But the one with the many form welcoming shade,
Showing of united efforts the only true worth.
Self-merged into greatness, your effort's repaid.

Katy's Sacrifice.

John Griffith, a rich English manufacturer, sat in a room in his elegant mansion one day in autumn. To judge by his face, his reflections were of an agreeable nature.

"The prospect is," he said to himself, "that my income for the present year will reach fifteen thousand pounds. That is a tidy sum for one who started as a poor boy. And I am not so old, either. Just turned sixty! There is more than one nobleman in the kingdom that would be glad of John Griffith's income. My Katy will hav a rich dowry."

He was interrupted here by the entrance of a servant.

"Mr. Griffith," he said, "there are three men below who would like to see you."

"Three men?"

"Yes, sir. They are not gentlemen," said the servant, who understood the question. "They are men from the mill, I'm thinking."

"Very well; show them up."

It was a holiday, and the works were not is operation, so that the operators were off work.

Then was heard the tramp of heavy boots on the staircase, and presently entered three men, whose dress and appearance indicated clearly that they belonged to the class who are doomed to earn their daily bread by hard and unremitting labor.

"What is your business with me, my men?" asked Mr. Griffith, rising and surveying them with interest. "Are you employed in the mill?"

"Yes, sir," said the foremost, Hugh Roberts, "yes, Mr. Griffith, sir, we are employed in the mill, and it's about that we've come to see you about."

"Very well," said John Griffith, resuming his seat, "speak on, whatever you hav to say to me."

"It's this, Mr. Griffith, sir, and I hope you won't be offended at what I say. We came here to humbly beg that you would be pleased to raise our wages."

"To raise your wages!" exclaimed Mr. Griffith, in a displeased tone.

"Yes, sir. I hope you won't be offended."

"Don't I giv you as high wages as are paid in other mills?"

"Mayhap you do, sir; but it's very hard to get along on three shillings a day."

"But if I should pay higher wages than others, they would undersell me in the market."

"I don't know, sir, but I think we should work cheerfully, and do more in a day, if we felt that we had a little more to liv on, so that the wife and children needn't hav to pinch and go hungry."

These words were uttered in a manly and straightforward tone, and there was not a little pathos in them, but it seemed lost upon Mr. Griffith.

"It's only sixpence more a day we ask, sir," said Hugh Roberts, pleadingly.

Mr. Griffith made a mental calculation. He had three hundred men in his employ. He found that sixpence a day in addition would make a sum total, during the year, of over two thousand pounds. This reflection hardened his heart against the applicants.

"No," he said, "your request is unreasonable; I cannot accede to it."

"But, sir," said Hugh Roberts, "think what it is to support a family on three shillings a day."

"It is hard, no doubt," said Mr. Griffith; "but I cannot afford to make the advance you desire."

"Then you refuse, sir?"

"I do. If you can do any better, of course, I won't prevent your bettering yourselvs."

"We can't do better, sir," said Hugh, bitterly, crushing his hat between his toil-hardened fingers. "We hav no other way to liv except to work for you and take what you are pleased to pay."

"Think it over, my men," said Mr. Griffith, more good-humoredly, for he had carried his point, "and you will see that I can't pay more than other manufacturers. I've no doubt your wives and children will earn something to help you along."

The three men departed with sad faces, looking as if life were a weary struggle, with little to cheer it.

Scarcely had they left the room when Kate Griffith entered.

Born when her father was comparativly late in life, she was his darling and the light of his existence. It was for her that he wished to become very rich, that he might make her a match for the highest, as he was wont to express it.

"They will overlook old John Griffith's pedigree," he said to himself, "if his daughter has a good hundred thousand pounds to her dowry."

Kate entered, a bright-eyed, attractiv girl of fifteen, of whom her father might well be proud.

"How are you, darling?" said her father, smiling fondly upon her.

"I am always well," she said lightly; "but, papa, who were those poor men that I met on the stairs? Hav you been scolding them?"

"What makes you ask, Katy?"

"Because they looked so sad and discouraged."

"Did they?" asked Mr. Griffith, with momentary compunction.

"Yes, papa; and I heard one of them sigh, as if he were tired of living."

"They were men from the mill, Katie."

"And what did they come for? Do you tell them about the work?"

"No; the overseer does that."

"Then, what did they come for?"

"You are curious, my darling."

"That isn't telling me, papa," said the young lady, persistently.

"Then, if you must know, it was to ask for higher wages."

"Of course you gave it."

"Of course I didn't. Why should I?"

"Because they need it. How much do they get now?"

"Three shillings a day."

"Only three shillings a day!" exclaimed Katy, "and hav to support their families out of that?"

"Yes."

"Oh, papa, how can you pay them such mean wages?"

"I pay as high wages as other manufacturers," said her father.

"But they can't liv on three shillings a day, poor men. How much more did they ask for?"

"Sixpence a day."

"Only sixpence a day, and you refused," said Katy, reproachfully.

"But consider, my dear, on all my workmen it would amount to more than two thousand pounds."

"And how much do you make in a year, papa?"

"This year," said Mr. Griffith, proudly, "I think I shall make nearly fifteen thousand pounds."

"You surely don't spend all that, papa?"

"No more than four thousand."

"And the rest?"

"I lay up for my Katy."

"Then," said Kate, "as it is to be mine, pay the men a shilling more a day. There'll be enough left for me. I shouldn't enjoy money that was taken from so many poor people. Think, papa, how much good the extra shilling would do your poor men, and how little difference it would make to me. I shall be as rich as I want to be. Come, papa, you were once poor yourself. You should pity the poor."

At these words, Mr. Griffith recalled the difficult struggle he had had early in life, and the selfishness of his present treatment of his poor operativs struck him forcibly. His own heart joined with his daughter.

"Are you in earnest, Katy, in what you say?" he asked.

"Surely, papa."

"If I do what you ask, it will make a considerable difference in your fortune."

"But I shall feel so happy when I think that the men are more comfortable. Won't you do it, papa?"

"Yes, Katy," said her father, "I will do as you say. Other manufacturers will think I hav gone insane, but if I please my Kate, I will not care."

"I love you better than ever now, papa," and the warm-hearted girl threw her arms around her father's neck.

A servant was sent to Hugh Roberts's cottage to bid him come to the great house. He was sitting in moody silence in his poor cabin, which was pervaded by a general air of want and discomfort. He did not understand the summons, but thought he might be going to receive his discharge in return for his bold request. Again he was ushered into the presence of his employer.

"I hav been thinking of your request, my man," said Mr. Griffith in a kind tone, "and though I doubt whether any other manufacturer would grant it, I hav made up my mind to do it."

"Bless you, sir!" said Hugh Roberts, his face lighting up. "Then we shall hav three shillings and sixpence hereafter?"

"Four shillings!"

"Are you really in earnest, sir?"

"Truly so. The overseer shall receive my instructions to morrow."

The workman burst into tears, but they were tears of joy.

"The men will bless you," he said, smiling, and the words had a pleasant sound for Mr. Griffith. A hearty blessing is not to be despised.

It was found on experiment that the profits of the business were but little affected by the increased wages, for the men now worked with a hearty good will, which enabled them to accomplish more work in a day, so that Katy's sacrifice will be less than was supposed. Every day she rejoices over the additional comforts secured by the extra shilling paid at her instigation.

Correspondence.

PORT-OF-SPAIN, TRINIDAD, Aug. 1, 290.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I take great pleasure in forwarding you a communication for the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER, with the hope that it may find a space for its insertion.

As I hav before stated to you, I shall always endeavor to communicate something which I think might be interesting and instructiv.

Wishing you health, I beg to remain,
Yours very faithfully, EM. DOS SANTOS.

[Our friend has our thanks for his kind interest in the Corner. The interesting articles with which he has favored us from time to time are always read with interest. Success and long life to him.—ED. C. C.]

Behind Time.

Some people go through life behind time. If they say they will come at three, they mean half-past three; and when they finally put in an appearance they do it leisurely and good naturedly, and are mildly surprised if you insinuate that you are displeased. When they die, though, their friends will be avenged, because they will probably reach the gates of heaven ten minutes behind time—and find them closed.

He Understood the Old Man.

The little boy had pounded his finger, and immediately set up a terrible hullaballoo. His father remonstrated with him, saying that he was no longer a baby and should act like a man.

"But," said the youngster, between his sobs, "if I act like a man I'd swear, and then you'd lick me!"

Science Column.

The Coco-nut Palm.

The coco-nut palm (cocos nucifera) is one of the most useful trees of tropical regions. This tree must not be confounded with the cacao tree, of which a description was given some time ago in the Corner. All the parts of the coco-nut palm are utilized, but its fruit is the most important product.

There is a curious tradition, with regard to the origin of this tree, from the East, which says that a king, by name Kusi Raja, a strenuous worshiper of the divine unity, rejected offerings to inferior divinities, and became almost equal to a god, creating many grains now known by man. Becoming ambitious, he meditated creating a superior race of men, but after completing the head, the demi-gods, alarmed, persuaded him to desist. The head became a coco-nut tree, and was dedicated to Ganesa, lord of science and protector of learned men.

This story of the origin of the coco-nut palm is a little funny, but I would advise those who view it in a more serious light than I do, to take it with "a little grain of salt."

Returning to our subject, and leaving our jocular origin for serious description, I might say that the coco-nut palms are about thirty to sixty feet high, and they hav the peculiarity that they never spring upright from the ground. The butt curves, and lies almost horizontal in some cases, and the whole stem up to the top is inclined to lean as often toward the wind as from it. Their innumerable roots, long, fleshy, about the thickness of a large string, piercing the ground in every direction, and running down to high tide mark—as the plantations are for the most part on the sea-coasts—apparently enjoy the salt water. In a plantation the trees are planted about ten yards equidistant, and each bears on an average about two hundred nuts per annum.

From the fruit are obtained many articles of luxury and trade; thus, first, the husk. After the thick green external pellicle is stripped off the shell, it is placed in the sun to dry; this, being fibrous, is beat into a sort of hemp, and is known by the name of "coir." It is spun into cables, ropes, and yarn of every dimension and size, from a single packthread to a cable for a first-rate man-of-war, and it is preferable for ships' use, as it is elastic.

The albumen, or kernel, produces oil by boiling it in water, after it has been pounded or rasped. Grated, a sweet milk, used as a substitute for cow's milk, is produced. By various preparations, jelly, butter, copra, candles, and sugar are produced, and, by fermentation, vinegar.

The nut when it is gathered young contains an opaline water, which is quite clear if filtered, and is utilized for drinking. In countries where potable water is not obtained only the milk or water of the coco-nut is drunk. It is an agreeable, nutritiv, and healthy beverage. E. S.

WATER OF LIFE.

This is a newly discovered natural spring water, introduced here for the first time to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which has been making many wonderful cures, by a thorough change of the fluids of the system. It contains chemical qualities which act upon the kidneys, bladder, liver, stomach, and bowels in a most favorable way to produce health. It will be of advantage to any person in bad health to send to the undersigned for a pamphlet giving certificates of cures and all necessary information concerning this remarkable remedy, Address J. R. PERRY, 34 South Main street, Wilkesbarre, Pa.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S "Children's Corner," MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, has been elected senior member of the School Board of Fall River, Mass.

The Truth Seeker Gives all the News of Freethought, and is Always on Guard Against the Encroachments of Ecclesiastics upon the People's Liberties.

If you have any Ideas or Reforms calculated to benefit humanity write to THE TRUTH SEEKER (sending your subscription) and let the world know of them. THE TRUTH SEEKER publishes each week more letters from the people than any other paper in the world.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is devoted to the defense of Mental Liberty, of American Institutions, and the Preservation of the United States Constitution, so far as regards religious tests, and the maintenance of human rights. It advocates the abolition of all laws based on religion or religious observances. It demands the taxation of church property. It is uncompromisingly opposed to anything tending toward a union of church and state, either in name or in fact.

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indescretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT. "Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address,

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second, that he fulfills all his agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would hav been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

GRANADA, Nicaraugua, a city built at the base of the volcano Mombacho, is suffering earthquake shocks which hav injured nearly every house in it. The volcano shows signs of eruption, and of the city's 15,000 inhabitants all but 3,000 hav left.

NOTWITHSTANDING Gladstone's supposed leaning toward the Catholic church, he has not hesitated to get himself in a dispute with that body by calling public notice to the fact that Pope Urban II. decreed that it is not murder to kill an excommunicated person.

SOFTENING of the brain is remarkably prevalent among the officers of Germany's choice regiments, especially in one composed of wealthy men. The cause is luxury and profligacy. It appears that officers who hav been removed for vicious cruelty to their men were insane for some time before their cashiering.

ANTIPATHY to physicians, fostered by ecclesiastics, yet lingers in Spain. The doctors working in infected districts in the late cholera epidemic were ill used by the peasants. They were provided with military escorts, but one was stabbed in the back, another had his head split open by a woman with a hatchet, and a third was murdered by a mob.

FEAR of Catholic plots is disturbing Mexico. President Diaz is rumored to hav been seduced into alliance with the Clerical party. Mrs. Diaz is a devout Catholic, and a few days ago entertained the archbishop of Mexico at the palace. It is said that in consequence of the president's suspected intrigues he was shot at by Liberals at a late public gathering.

SOME begin to concur in Lord Wolseley's opinion that Asia, as well as Europe, America, and Australia, are destined eventually to succumb to hordes of Chinese, who are the coming race and will overrun the world as soon as some military genius rises among them. China has a bold bearing toward the powers lately, and seems to deem herself now able to resist any coalition.

DIFFICULTIES seem brewing between the Chinese emperor and the embassadors of the European powers, over the insistence of the former that the envoys shall approach him with the "kotow," a salutation consisting in casting one's self on the ground and knocking three times on it with one's forehead. This the ministers hav refused, and consequently they hav not been admitted to the imperial presence for years.

Gems of Thought.

I HEAR a preacher announce for his text and topic the expediency of one of the institutions of his church. Do I not know beforehand that not possibly can he say a new and spontaneous word? Do I not know that, with all this ostentation of examining the grounds of the institution, he will do no such thing? Do I not know that he is pledged to himself not to look but at one side--the permitted side, not as a man, but as a parish minister? He is a retained attorney, and these airs of the bench are the emptiest affectation.—Emerson.

THEY hav, in Massachusetts, at a place called Andover, a kind of minister factory, where each professor takes an oath once in five years—that time being considered the life of an oath—that he has not, during the last five years, and will not, during the next five years, intellectually advance.—Ingersoll.

THE chief cause which made the fusion of the different elements of society so imperfect was the extreme difficulty which our ancestors found in passing from place to place. Of all inventions, the alphabet and the printing press alone excepted, those inventions which abridge distance hav done most for the civilization of our species. Every improvement of the means of locomotion benefits mankind morally and intellectually as well as materially, and not only facilitates the interchange of the various productions of nature and art, but tends to remove national and provincial antipathies, and to bind together all the branches of the great human family.—Macaulay.

IT is a curious and interesting exercise to take any common article of daily use and inquire what consequences followed its introduction, and what part it plays in the welfare of man. Take paper, for ins ance. It made the art of printing possible. It made the newspaper possible, and especially the daily paper. The multiplication of pictures by engraving could not be carried on without it, nor the modern art of photography, to which I shall refer again. We attach great value to a system of general education as one of the most important agencies of modern civilization. But the first requisit of such a system is cheap books, and for these paper is the only thing we could use.—Chauncey Smith.

FORTUNATELY, another force was born into the world. Whether "black Barthel," the German monk, discovered gunpowder, or whether Friar Bacon preceded him, is of little consequence. The fourteenth century was yet quite young when somebody found out that a mixture of sulphur, niter, and charcoal would deliver a heavy blow. With his rifle in hand the common man reclothed himself with all the rights that had been torn from him by a thousand years of the despotism of the Man on Horseback. The musket has steadily led the way and supported every extension of the boundaries of freedom. Without so irresistible a weapon within reach of every man's hand, the world would still be prostrate under the hoofs of an equestrian aristocracy, whose despotism would only be tempered by the tyranny of kingcraft.—McElroy.

LET nothing come between you and the light. Respect men as brothers only. When you travel to the celestial city, carry no letter of introduction. When you knock, ask to see God—none of the servants. In what concerns you much do not think you hav companions; know that you are alone in the world.—Thoreau.

To thine own self be true;
And it must follow, as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man.
—Shakspere.

THERE is an universal tendency among mankind to conceive all beings like themselvs, and to transfer to every object those qualities with which they are familiarly acquainted, and of which they are intimately conscious. . . . The unknown causes, which continually employ their thought, appearing always in the same aspect, are all apprehended to be of the same kind or species. Nor is it long before we ascribe to them thought and reason and passion, and sometimes even the limbs and figures of men, in order to bring them nearer to a resemblance with ourselvs. —Hume.

AS IT OFTEN HAPPENS.—EFFECT OF TEACHING THE DOCTRIN OF REDEMPTION.

Notes and Clippings.

At the inauguration of the statue of Joan of Arc at Nancy the other day three sermons were preached, respectivly by the Catholic bishop, the Protestant pastor, and the Jewish rabbi. The pastor exalted Joan as an independent Christian; the bishop spoke of her ardent piety, and assailed the memory of the bishop and the clergy who condemned her; and the rabbi placed her "above all religions." He compared her to Esther and Judith, and other great women in history. Which of the three was right?

Various doctrins of the Roman church of to-day were denounced and condemned by the early fathers and popes. The third and fourth Ecumenical councils, A.D 431 and A.D 451, accepted the Nicene creed as final, and anathematized those who should change it. Yet it has been changed, added to, by Pius IX. in 1854, and by the Vatican council in 1870, which declared respectivly that the immaculate conception of the Virgin and the infallibility of the pope, speaking ex cathedra, were articles of the Roman Catholic faith.

This is how a parson took leave of his parishioners in a town in the far West, as related by Vanity Fair: "Dearly beloved, our parting does not seem hard to me, for three reasons—you do not love me, you do not love each other, and the Lord does not love you. If you loved me, you would hav paid me for my services during the past two years; you do not love each other, otherwise I should hav more marriages to celebrate; and the Lord does not love you, for otherwise he would call more of you to him, and I should hav more funeral services to conduct."

Bishop Gilmour, the Catholic bishop of Ohio, has excommunicated J. J. Greeves, the editor of the Catholic Knight, of Cleveland, on the ground, among others, that his paper is "a falsifier of law and fact, and a cesspool of scandal." The judgment not only covers the wretched Greeves, but all his correspondents, lay and clerical, and all his canvassers, agents, correspondents, and even subscribers. They are all forbidden to work for or read the Knight. That Greeves will get the worst of it in the encounter we hav no doubt. Of course, he will, if a really hardened sinner, try a series of slashing articles showing what a pitiful sort of ecclesiastic the bishop is, but the bishop will assuredly "down" him in the long run. The staying power of Catholic dignitaries is very great. The most "ringing editorial" from one of their own flock glances off them like hail off a tin roof. Few will hear of Greeves's fate without wishing there were some authority like Bishop Gilmour's among the heretics and Infidels, which could shut up "the falsifiers of law and fact and the cesspools of scandal." The ripeness of some of our editorial brethren in these parts for excommunication of some sort on the above grounds is notorious. Down in Philadelphia, for instance, how a good rattling excommunication or two would clear the murky journalistic atmosphere, and make the Wanamaker "ads." fly.—Evening Post.

The Deseret Semi-Weekly News, a Mormon paper published at Salt Lake City, says: "Persistent efforts hav been made by various denominations to evangelize the Indians. Very few people hav any idea of the failures that hav attended these attempts, as the official reports of missionary societies, as a rule, cover them up and giv publicity only to supposed success. A story is in circulation in the press that throws some light upon the 'evangelization' of the aborigines. The following is from the Denver News: 'A number of Stony Indians hav been in and around Donald for some time. Before they left on Monday they threw one of their horses down, then piled wood upon it and burnt it alive. It was reported to Sheriff Redgrave about 7 o'clock on Tuesday morning. The sheriff and Officer H. Redgrave proceeded to their camp, about two miles from Donald, and found the poor creature standing up, burnt from shoulders to head, flesh all charred and skin burnt and eyes blind, and in a horrible suffering state. Other Indians, the Kootenays, were camping there, and the sheriff insisted they shoot the animal, which they did, the officer finishing its misery by his revolver. Later the sheriff found out that the cause of their burning the horse was that one of their children was very sick, and to make it well they placed the horse in misery.' These Indians figure in the records of the Episcopalian church as 'converts.' They attend church and partake of the so-called sacrament like white church-members."

The Christian Scientists hav been given a hard rap by Judge Loren L. Lewis, of the supreme court of New York. This he did in rendering decision in a habeas corpus case for the custody of a child whose mother is a Christian Scientist. In that decision he declares that between the contending father and mother he should giv the child to the mother, but the evidence shows that the mother is a devotee of Christian Science. The judge condenses the testimony thus: "The respondent is a believer, it seems, in that system of treating the sick known as Christian Science, which, as I understand, consists in the main in prayer for the restoration of the sick. The deceased child was taken with spasms, which continued twenty-four hours, and until she died. The respondent called a Christian Scientist to treat her, who, the evidence shows, sat by the child eight hours while she was suffering constantly with spasms. No remedies were administered by her, unless silent prayer may be said to be a remedy. After the child had been in spasms eight hours, its grandparents learning of its sickness, remonstrated with the respondent as to the manner in which she had been treated, and at their request a physician was called. His remedies failing to help the child, he informed the friends that the patient, he thought, would die, and the mother thereupon, against the grandparents' objections, again called the Christian Scientist, but the child, however, died before she arrived. The facts are stated because they hav had some influence upon my mind in deciding this question. Should I award the custody of Lucy to her mother, she would if sick, probably be treated as her sister was, and I think it unwise to make a person entertaining such views of treating the sick the custodian of so young a child as Lucy is."

Communications.

The cruel acts of men, instead of being instigated by the devil, hav been prompted by their inherent brutality.

When the Sunday-school lessons shall be exchanged for lessons in humanity, the devil will find less to do, and God will then be more merciful.

Christians are always calling upon God to do something, but he never does the right thing at the right time.

When two armies are arrayed in battle, he is expected to help both sides. But he invariably deserts the weaker side without any regard to justice. He must stop a drouth or make it rain whenever a Christian thumbs the rubber. A God who will do just as the Christian tells him to is just such a God as the Christian believes in, and will change as the minds of men vary.

A rubber idol which the Christian can shape to suit his fancy would be just as effectiv as the God that Christians pray to. If a man be naturally cruel, his God is cruel. If he is benevolent and humane, his God is more decent. Study a man closely, and you will be able to form a just conception of his God. The Christian says his God is in heaven, but he exists nowhere only in the imagination of men.

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow." And shall we praise him for all the curses, too? If he is the author of all the blessings, so also is he the author of all the curses, and they are not few.

If the Christian should keep an honest account with his God, he would be surprised at the way the debit and credit columns would foot up. If he sends us the rains and the dews and the sunshine, he also sends the drouths, floods, earthquakes, and tornadoes. If he has given us the horse, the ox, the sheep, the camel, and other useful animals, he has also given us the tiger, the panther, the rattlesnake, the cobra, tarantula, scorpion, centipede, and many poisonous insects, which terrify and torment us, and often produce death.

We are to thank God for the variations of the seasons, for the alternation of day and night, for the changes of the moon, for the genial rays of the sun and for many other things which the Christian regards as blessings.

When the old chief was asked what made lightning, he replied: "Big Injun spit um fire." God has just as much to do with producing the above-mentioned phenomena as a dead Indian has with producing lightning.

Does God make it freeze when the mercury runs down to thirty-two degrees, and make water boil at two hundred and twelve? Does God make it cold at the poles and hot at the equator? Does God make a stone fall to the earth when it is cast into the air? Does God cause the shot to fall from the tower in globular forms?

If so, who would ever engage in the manufacture of shot, for he might take it into his head to make them fall in cubes, and that would ruin the business?

The side of a hill facing the south will be bare, and the side facing the north will be covered with snow.

The south side of a roof is frequently bare when the north side is covered with snow.

Everyone has noticed how the snow is affected by these different exposures in the spring when it is being melted.

Does the Christian think God has anything to do with this phenomenon?

Near the poles the rays of the sun strike obliquely on the surface, and the same number of rays are spread over a greater amount of space. At the equator the sun's rays fall perpendicular to the earth and the same number of rays cover less surface. And this accounts mainly for the difference in heat and cold at the equator and the poles. The reason why the snow melts sooner on the south side of a roof than it does on the north side, and on the side of a hill facing the south sooner than on the side facing to the north, is the reason why it is warmer at the equator than at the poles. Instead of there being a God at work, there is simply cause and effect.

"Praise God for the variations of the seasons." Thus the inhabitants of Jupiter may be cursing God because they hav no variations of the seasons at all. And the inhabitants of Venus may be finding fault because they hav too great a variation of the seasons. The inclination of the earth's axis, twenty-three and a half degrees, givs us a very agreeable variety of the seasons. Jupiter revolves upon an axis perpendicular to the plane of its orbit. Consequently there is an equal exposure of the poles and the equator to the sun in every part of its orbit, and therefore no change of seasons.

Place a barrel-hoop upon four inverted tumblers on a table. In the center of the hoop put a low lamp to represent the sun. Take a piece of wire and run it through an orange so that the sides shall project an inch to either side, to represent the axis of a planet

Take hold of the wire and hold it perpendicular to the plane of the hoop and pass it around the lamp.

If the axis be kept perpendicular to the plane of the hoop, it will be seen that a given point on the orange will hav an equal exposure to the lamp in every part of the orbit.

Incline the wire about twenty-three degrees to the plane of the hoop, keeping the wire pointing in the same direction, say to the north, and pass it around the lamp. In one point of the orbit the wire will point to the lamp, corresponding to the position of the earth in its orbit about the 20th of June. In the opposit part of the hoop or orbit, the wire will point away from the lamp, corresponding to the earth's position about the 21st of December. Midway between those points the wire will lean sideways to the lamp, corresponding with the position of the earth about the 20th of March and the 20th of September, when the sun is on the equator.

Tilt the wire seventy-five degrees to the plane of the hoop, and pass the orange around as before, and it will be found that the zones overlap each other, giving a peculiarity in the changes of the seasons known to the planet Venus.

A few experiments, as I hav directed, with a little reflection, will satisfy anyone how little God has to do with the seasons. And he has just as much to do with the rainbow and eclipses, and every celestial movement and phenomenon, as he has with alternation of day and the regularity of the seasons.

"If a man can witness the glory and splendor of the rising sun, and not be moved by feelings of devotion toward the great architect of the universe, he is of the earth, earthy, and of the brute, brutal." So says the Christian. Just turn the orange a few times upon its axis, as above mentioned, and see that the side next the lamp must be illuminated, while the opposit side is in darkness, and then one will see how much God has to do with the glory of the rising sun. There is the law of light and shade and nothing more. The more we know about the laws of nature, the less we shall find for God to do. Notwithstanding all that has ever been said and written about God, we know no more than when the investigation first began. The reason is, we can know nothing about what does not exist.

The untutored man sees many things which he cannot account for. And he forms in his mind a great being with power adequate to the performance of any act, and attributes everything which he does not understand to the act of this great imaginary first cause. Without doubt this is the way the God idea found a lodgment in the human mind. Ever the thought comes home to me that a knowledge of the natural will do away with superstition, and banish all the gods. Will the world ever find out how much its progress has been retarded by superstition, which has its root mainly in the God idea?

By means of superstitious ideas instilled into the minds of the young, a few designing men hav been able to reduce the many to a state of mental servitude, and make them do their bidding like willing slaves. Men can be led in any direction and into any extravagance if they can first be made to believe that a certain line of action, however preposterous, is pleasing to God.

A man under the influence of superstition is like one who is lost. He has not the power to reason, and will not credit what he sees with his own eyes. Though blind, he thinks he sees with the clearest vision. Though his mind is benumbed, he thinks he is the clearest reasoner. He will not hear the truth because he is already in the possession of it. He does not want to change because he knows he is right. "I hav been summoned before the prophet," said a Mormon to the wife whom he loved, "and he has given me just one week to take another wife, or be cut off from the church and turned over to the buffetings of Satan." Which meant blood atonement, to be murdered by the Danites.

"Let us flee," said she. "We cannot flee from God," said he. "I am not afraid of those who can only kill the body, but I am afraid of him who can destroy both body and soul in hell. The prophet hath spoken, and the voice of the prophet is the voice of God. If God commands a thing we must not question his wisdom. He knows the secrets of our hearts, and he knows that it will cost me more than life to obey, and he would not require such sacrifices at our hands if it were not for our good." "In some way," she said, "there seems to be a lie between the innermost feelings of my heart and the will of God."

What strange spell, it may be asked, can come over the human mind, to make it willingly outrage every instinct of nature? Are the infernal regions a reality, and are devils absolutely let loose to turn men and women into strange and unnatural animals? Nothing of the kind. Under the power of certain hallucinations men hav torn and mangled their own flesh, and tortured the innocent and helpless. Jephtha murdered his daughter; Abraham showed a willingness to kill his son, and Freeman butchered his little girl.

There is nothing so unnatural, revolting, and cruel that men will not do it with seeming pleasure, if the mind has been sufficiently warped. Mormonism differs neither in kind or degree from the Christian religion. The Christian and the Mormon believe in a God. The imagination has clothed this being with certain attributes. This God has revealed his will to man through certain other men. These human instruments through whom God has made his will known are regarded as middle-men between heaven and earth, and are nearer to God and hav more power with him than other men.

When these dogmas are so thoroughly instilled into the mind that doubt never enters, the character of the devotee will then depend upon what he conceives to be the will of God. The will of God will depend upon the character of the human instrument through whom the will is made known. If it be a human butcher like old Joshua, or a polygamist like Solomon or Brigham Young, or a wholesale robber like David, why, then the war, or robbery, or butchery, or polygamy, which is commanded, will be the will of God of course. "The voice of the prophet is the voice of God." So says the Mormon, so says the Mohammedan, so says the Jew, so says the Christian.

Whenever one of these heavenly go-betweens commands an act of murder, it will be obeyed with as much alacrity as the greatest act of charity, as all the murders of the Inquisition attest. Nothing can be wrong which God commands.

This is the clew to all the wars, murders, tortures, cruelties, outrages, and abominations which hav ever been committed in the name of any religion.

A man with a mind thus imbued can never be safe in society, any more than a man afflicted with any other kind of lunacy. What further evidence of the fact can be required than that men kill their own children because they think it pleasing to their great India rubber idol? If a man can be led to outrage the woman he loves by marrying another woman, and if a woman who regards her husband as the apple of her eye will allow another woman to come between her and her husband, he or she will perform any other act however abominable if made to believe that God requires the act at their hands. In all ages men hav been found willing to commit the most diabolical acts which ever besmeared the pages of history, when they believed that the command had come from the great India rubber whangdoodle through one of his lieutenants on earth.

Man never bows his knee until he is robbed of his manhood. He never crouches like a whipped spaniel without being in fear of some man or monster whom or which he regards as master. What he conceives to be the will of that master, that will he do, right or wrong.

Christians fight the Mormons because they believe them to be a class of superstitious, cruel, polygamous wretches. Their prophets are impostors who mislead and deceive the people. But Brigham Young was entitled to more honor and credit than the prophets of old. He did not keep as many wives, was more moral and a better prophet, because more intelligent. And what could be more cruel than whipping women, hanging witches, and the tortures of the Inquisition, sanctioned by all Christians for hundreds of years?

And what superstition in all Mormondom exceeds that of eating a piece of bread and calling it the body of a man who died two thousand years ago, or of drinking wine and calling it his blood? And if their polygamous lives are to be reprobated, what must be thought of old Solomon, the wisest man in the eyes of all Christians who ever dwelt upon the face of the earth?

Yes, the Christian can see the superstition of the Mormon, but can he, will he, see that he himself is under the influence of a superstition equally absurd and degrading? The Christian is unable to see how Mohammedans can be imposed upon by believing that Mohammed was sent on a divine mission, and was gifted with supernatural powers. But it is no absurdity to believe these things of Christ.

If supernatural powers were bestowed upon Jesus, he lacked the principles of humanity which ought to adorn the character of every well-meaning man. What would hav been thought of a man last winter who by the turning of his hand, or by a word, or the mere fiat of his will, could hav cured every case of the grippe, and yet let hundreds all over the country suffer and die?

Christ healed the leper. If he could heal one, he could a dozen—all who were afflicted. Then why allow any to suffer with this tormenting, painful disease? He caused the blind to see. If he could do it in a few cases, he could do it in all. Why allow anyone to grope in darkness? He cured the lame. If he had that power over a few, he had it over all. Why let men cripple around on canes and crutches?

Now, my Christian friends, take your choice. If Christ had power to cure all and did not do it, he lacked humanity. If he did not hav the power, he was not God; if not God, then mere man, and that is all he was, and all the rest is mere superstition such as characterizes the Mormon and the Mohammedan.

The Common Sense Club.

Rationalistic organizations hav not achieved numerical success. The history of Liberal leagues, Freethought clubs, and Secular societies is a record of an enthusiastic start, and either a quarrelsome or a languid finish. This statement does not imply that they are not useful, but merely declares that they are not permanent. Two causes appear to be a sufficient explanation of this fact, apart from the influence of Christian hostility.

The first cause arises from their foundation principle—freedom. All restriction upon the progress of thought and upon its expression having been removed, the members, who at the beginning united in consequence of harmonious opinion, soon diverged in ideas. Being men and possessing the usual amount of "human nature," even their profession of freedom fails to make them tolerant. It is an axiom of art that there is more strife between the shades than between the colors, and an illustration of this principle is found in the remark of an eminent veteran Liberal, that he had experienced more opposition from those near to him in thought than he had from the orthodox. This perhaps may be explained as the result of self-conceit.

A person who has thought for himself and developed heresy resents the progress of others beyond him as an imputation that he has not arrived at ultimate truth; and his opinions being the creation of his own mental effort he is more strenuous in maintaining them than is one who has inherited orthodoxy and can giv no reason for wearing his grandfather's hat, except that it was his grandfather's. Freedom causes the differences, but finds its limits by intolerance. It is also a fact that only those of similar ideas desire intimate association, and the agreement upon the foundation principle of Naturalism which animates all Freethinkers is not sufficient to prevent antagonism upon minor differences that assume prominence in expression and hav a bearing upon the life of the individual.

The second cause of the failure of rationalistic organizations arises from the principle of altruism. Their main intention is the conversion of others to similar opinions, but the missionary zeal soon flags, and the member of the society, finding that he is getting but little for himself, drops off in attention. He has settled the condemnation of supernaturalism and gets tired of reiterated argument and the flogging of a dead horse. He becomes indifferent to Liberal literature because its ideas are so familiar; and as Christians are opposed to reading heresy, the Liberal journal languishes. Those who like it do not need it, and those who need it do not like it.

Divergence of opinion and lack of inducement are the two chief causes of the waning membership of Freethought societies; and the remedies are clearly tolerance and self-interest. But the mere preaching of tolerance will not secure its establishment; and the remedies are merged in one—egoism. The member must find a personal advantage in the organization. It must afford pleasure and profit beyond the satisfaction arising from propagandism. To secure this the society must supply entertainment and promote practical measures for the welfare of its adherents and of society at large.

Owing to the unpopularity of professed Liberalism it is difficult to secure desirable or numerous membership in organizations that are avowedly rationalistic. Young and talented persons refrain from joining them through fear of social ostracism or business injury, and fashionable people consider that it is not "good form" to belong to a Freethought club. As an escape from these difficulties and as a means of uniting all the live people of a place in secular work and play that will indirectly lead them away from supernatural belief and otherworldliness, the Common Sense Club is suggested, with the following platform:

Motto: Use common sense.

Maxim: Natural law rules the world.

Precepts: Be happy. Do good. Do no harm.

The motto certainly cannot be objected to, and people would be rather ashamed to refuse to join a society whose main purpose was the exercise of common sense. This faculty is the rectifier of error and ill. Emerson says, "The cure of a bad theology is not another, but common sense." Lecky in his "History of Rationalism in Europe" (p 95), says, "From the publication of the essays of Montaigne, we may date the influence of that gifted and ever enlarging rationalistic school, which gradually effected the destruction of the belief in witchcraft, not by refuting or explaining its evidence, but simply by making men more and more sensible of its intrinsic absurdity," so that, as he says (p. 92), "the old theological measure of probability has completely disappeared, and is replaced by a shrewd, secular common sense."

The maxim, Natural law rules the world, when apprehended roots out supernatural belief and shows that miracles do not happen. Evolution is perceived to be the order of the universe. Development through constant successions of cause and effect, without the interference of the arbitrary will of a divine being, is seen to be the method of nature's work and progress. Consequently prayer for such interference ceases and natural means are sought and used. The foundation principle of Rationalism is embodied in this maxim and by its truth superstition is destroyed.

The three precepts summarize all philosophy and all religion. The first, "Be Happy," antagonizes Christian asceticism and suggests that in self-development lies the power of usefulness. Egotism precedes and promotes altruism. Pleasure and pain are the two guides to truth, one directing, the other warning. The four canons of Epicurus, interpreted by knowledge and common sense, supply the rules for happiness: 1. The pleasure which produces no pain is to be embraced. 2. The pain which produces no pleasure is to be avoided. 3. The pleasure is to be avoided which prevents a greater pleasure or produces a greater pain. 4. The pain is to be endured which averts a greater pain or secures a greater pleasure." Herbert Spencer says in the "Data of Ethics:" "The good is universally the pleasurable. Conduct is good or bad as its result to self or others is pleasurable or painful: the need for commandments from God disappears. . . . Great miseries are caused by persevering in actions repugnant to the sensations and neglecting actions which the sensations prompt." Therefore to be happy is to be good. The second precept: Be good, summarizes the Golden Rule and all positiv ethics; and the third precept: Do no Harm, which may be called the Diamond rule, embraces all negativ edicts, so that in these three precepts we hav condensed the philosophy of conduct and the essence of all laws and gospels, furnishing a platform and creed comprehending all natural morality and broad enough for all to stand upon who are controled by common sense.

The Common Sense Club in every town should become the deviser and promoter of entertainment and social pleasure, and thus in small communities replace the church as the center of attraction, destroying the incongruity of going for fun to a place consecrated to the preaching of hell and damnation. It should be the arena for discussing and planning local improvements, and for determining political and social economics. It should apply common sense to all the affairs of life. In the home, it should study how drudgery and care can be lessened by inculcation of simpler habits and combined efforts, and discuss the feasibility of relieving the toils of women and increasing the comfort of all by having in common kitchens, laundries, nurseries, schools, gardens, libraries, and other necessities and luxuries. It should apply common sense to municipal affairs and determin which principle is the better—to let individuals supply public needs at a profit, or to let the people collectivly provide for their wants at cost. If the latter course is believed to be the most sensible, agitation should be directed toward the municipal control of gas, water, tramways, roads, electric light, and the supply of fuel and staple articles of food. Plans for bettering the condition or appearance of the town should here be freely canvassed and the results should be brought to the notice of the proper authorities. This informal parliament might in time become the executiv power of the place and realize the dream of a pure democracy where voluntary association made law and government obsolete.

The Common Sense Club would also consider national affairs. The question of private enterprise and monopoly, as against collectiv control, would again be raised, and the railway, post-office, express, telegraph, mines, forests, and great industries would hav attention, and the propriety of management by the people for the people would be settled. It would be questioned whether it is sensible for people only to trade within certain geographical limits and with men who dwell under the same flag or if they should indorse the sentiment of Thomas Paine, "The world is my country." It would debate the vexed questions of capital and labor and form opinions as to the feasibility of substituting coöperation in the place of competition.

All the affairs of life could be "ventilated" and common sense be brought to bear upon their consideration. Shutting up museums, libraries, and art galleries and stopping all means of travel on the workingman's day of leisure; paying chaplains to open legislativ proceedings; appointing days for thanksgiving and fasting; exempting religious property from taxation; giving public money to sectarian institutions; reading the Bible in schools; prosecuting for obscenity men who use plain language for good purposes; allowing vacant land to be held by speculators; refusing divorce to mismated couples; wearing mourning costumes for the dead—all these and a multitude of other questionable customs should be brought to the bar of common sense, and when a verdict is rendered let suitable action follow.

If every town would start a Common Sense Club, the time, talent, and money that now go largely to waste in the church and the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor might be saved from fruitless expenditure for the glory of God and be made to bring forth an abundant harvest for the service of man.

ROBERT C. ADAMS.

Religion in Politics in Wisconsin.

I hav seen very little if anything in THE TRUTH SEEKER concerning the church and state war now on in Wisconsin state politics. The state legislature two years ago, at the instigation of the Turners of Milwaukee (German-Americans), and others, passed what has since been known as the Bennett law. It took its name from a man named Bennett, an Irish-American and a Catholic, who introduced it, and was passed without a dissenting vote, both parties voting for it. The law in effect enacted that all children be taught certain rudimentary studies in the English language, the law being aimed at certain parochial schools where no English was taught. It was felt that a future citizen had a right to be raised to speak the language of the country he or she must battle for a living in, and that, as long as parents were careless, it was the duty of the state to step in and prevent the child from being thus handicapped. Some time after its passage objection began to be heard to the law. It came, significantly enough, from Lutheran and Catholic clergymen, mostly Germans, and at once a warm controversy arose that has grown in intensity until the present time, when the two political parties are arrayed against each other over it, and it is being made the fighting-ground for the election of a new governor. Governor Hoard, whose signature made the bill a law, is stanchly defending it, and Mayor Peck (the Peck's Bad Boy man) of Milwaukee is the Democratic nominee. A good many Democrats are disgruntled because the party took issue against the law, and a good many Lutheran Republicans hav deserted at the dictation of the priests.

George W. Peck is known in Milwaukee as the "assistant Baptist," he having thus called himself in working to raise a mortgage from a Baptist church that wanted to put up a new "natatorium." Hoard, if anything, is a Liberal, or, at best, a thinking Christian. He has gone into the fight with the utmost courage, and while it is hard to predict the outcome, the Republicans are quite sanguin. I hav merely sketched this brief outline of the situation because I think nothing definit about Wisconsin's church fight has appeared in this journal. I wish, however, to write of a laughable phase of the contest. As is not uncommon in state campaigns, the parties hav imported prominent speakers from Washington to do a little stumping, and the Democrats hav just had Roger Q. Mills, of Texas, here. Mr. Mills knows more about tariff and the Mills bill than he does about the Bennett law, but he came here, a great distance, to tell the people of the state of the iniquities of the law. He seemed to imagin that the Democratic party here had constituted itself the especial agent of God to protect his children from the tyranny of a godless state, and so he made a great many very devout speeches. Here are some choice excerpts, and they will appeal to TRUTH SEEKER readers as the outpouring of a heart swelled with grace and stamped like our pennies, "In God we trust:"

> And in every country where I am, as long as I am a free man, I will do everything in my power to hav laws changed that would compel me to send my child to a school where he could be taught there was no God, no atoning sacrifice, no sufferer on Calvary for the redemption of the sins of the world, and that there was no hell.
> I am responsible to him alone who created me and gave me breath, I hav got to render my account to him, and I would a great deal rather render my account to him than render it to the Republican legislature of Wisconsin. He knows my faults; he knows my frailties; he knows the temptations to which I am subjected; he sees the tears in my eyes when I turn with repentance toward him. The legislature of Wisconsin, if Republican, would never see them in the world. He knows how to weigh all the mitigating circumstances, and if I hav got to fall into either human or divine hands to deal with me for my shortcomings, I say with one of old, let me fall rather into the hands of God than into the hands of man. I would not trust the best man that ever lived in any part of the United States, my own state, my nativ state, your state, anybody else's state, to determin for me my duty to my God or my duty to myself.
> You cannot answer for me, my friends. I do not care how good you are. You may be wrong. My mind may be illuminated by divine truth from above. I may hav studied these questions more than you hav.
> Suppose I am brought to the bar to answer before him whose eye never sleeps, for something you hav commanded me to do, when I knew that something is wrong, my conscience has informed me, my brain has been enlightened; you cannot answer for me then.

From these few specimens of a great deal of such rubbish, it is apparent that Senator Blair is not alone in his legislativ holiness.

FREDERIC HEATH.

Milwaukee, Sept. 27, 1890.

DURING three centuries Christianity had been endeavoring to introduce into the empire the element of religion. It was under Constantine that Christianity succeeded, not in making religion the prevailing element, but in giving it a prominent part to perform. Monarchy here presents itself under a different aspect; it is not of earthly origin; the prince is not the representativ of the sovereignty of the public; he is the image, the representativ, the delegate of God. Power descends to him from on high. —Guizot.

The American Secular Union Congress.

PROGRAM.

While we are not prepared to giv an exact list of the exercises at the coming Congress, we herewith furnish some information that may be of interest to our friends.

The Congress will assemble on Friday evening, Oct. 31 1890, in the Grand Opera House at Portsmouth, O. President Westbrook will call the meeting to order, and announce certain committees. An address of welcome will be delivered by J. L. Treuthart, president of the local Union, and an original poem will be read by Lawyer Searl on the same subject—to both of which President Westbrook will make a reply. The secretary's report will then be read, at the close of which she will deliver an address on organization. This will be the keynote of the Convention; and it is very desirable that our friends be present on this occasion.

On Saturday morning, at 9 o'clock, the election of officers and other business will claim the attention of the Congress; and on Saturday afternoon there will be a general discussion of the best methods of promoting the objects of the American Secular Union—a discussion which will consist of short speeches. This, of course, will be open to all. Dr. Henrietta P. Westbrook will read a short paper on "Common Sense." On Saturday evening, an address will be delivered by Mrs. A. M. Freeman, on "The Battle for Bread;" and another address will be delivered by Judge C. B. Waite, probably on "God in the Constitution." Dr. Paul Carus, editor of the Open Court, and Lawyer Geeting, of Chicago, will also deliver short addresses.

On Sunday morning, addresses will be delivered by Rabbi David Philipson, of Cincinnati, and by the well-known lecturer, W. F. Jamieson. On Sunday afternoon, President Westbrook will deliver an address on "The Bible in Public Schools," and will be followed by the well known New York lawyer and philosophical writer, T. B. Wakeman. On Sunday evening, addresses will be delivered by L. K. Washburn, of the Boston Investigator, on "The Sunday Question," and by Charles Watts, of Canada, editor of Secular Thought, on "The Church and the Throne."

Other addresses will be made by various speakers whom we are not yet prepared to announce; and the above program will be subject to alterations and emendations, should it be found necessary to transfer any speaker or speakers from one evening to another, etc. We hav not yet received answers to the invitations given to Dr. McGlynn and Professor Adler.

Fine musical selections, both vocal and instrumental, will be furnished at each session, through the enterprise and liberality of our Portsmouth friends.

We are sorry to announce that Colonel Ingersoll will not be present. He has not delivered a lecture for nearly five years; and the present state of his health, as well as his business engagements, will not permit him to make the journey to Portsmouth.

Through the efforts of our friends in Portsmouth and Chicago, we hav succeeded in obtaining reduced rates on railroads running to the Congress; and these reductions are obtainable by all who attend the Congress, whether members or otherwise.

Friends leaving Chicago for the Congress will find it to their advantage to go by the Baltimore & Ohio, as this road charges but $14.75 for the round trip, and does not compel those purchasing tickets at this rate to go all at the same time on one ticket, as the other roads do, but will sell separate tickets, so that members who may be delayed to a later train can still hav the advantage of the reduced fare. Those who wish to get their tickets at this reduction should consult Mr. A. M. Freeman, 402 West Madison street, Chicago, Ill., by mail or in person.

Our Portsmouth friends inform us that the Eastern, Central, and Southern railroad lines (the Western Passenger Association has declined to enter the pool) will grant us a reduction of two-thirds the regular fare on our homeward tickets, provided we comply with the following conditions:

1. Each person desiring the reduction must purchase a first-class ticket to Portsmouth, O., for which he will pay the regular fare; and upon request, the ticket agent will, at the time he buys the ticket, giv him a printed certificate of purchase, properly filled out and signed by said ticket agent.

2 If through tickets cannot be procured at the starting-point, the traveler must purchase to the most convenient point where through tickets can be obtained, and repurchase through to Portsmouth, requesting a certificate from the ticket agent at the point where repurchase is made.

3. Tickets for the return journey will be sold, by the ticket agent at Portsmouth, O., at one-third the highest limited fare, only to those holding certificates (referred to above) signed by the ticket agent at the point where through ticket to Portsmouth was purchased, and countersigned by Ida C. Craddock, secretary of the American Secular Union, certifying that the holder has been in regular attendance at the Portsmouth Congress.

4. It is absolutely necessary that such a certificate be procured by each traveler, as it proves that full fare has been paid for the journey to Portsmouth, and that the purchaser is therefore entitled to the excursion fare returning. It will also determin the route via which the ticket for the return journey should be issued.

5. On some of the roads, tickets for return journey will be furnished only on certificates procured not more than three days before the meeting assembles, nor later than three days after the commencement of the meeting, and will be available for continuous passage only; no stop-over privileges being allowed on tickets sold at less than full fares. Certificates will not be honored unless presented within three days after the date of the adjournment of the Congress.

6 Ticket agents will be instructed that the excursion fares will not be available unless the holders of certificates are properly identified, as above described, by Ida C. Craddock, secretary of the American Secular Union, on the certificate.

7. These certificates are not transferable.

8. The reduction on return journey will apply only to the point at which a traveler's through ticket was purchased to Portsmouth on his way to the Congress.

9 (Very important) NO REFUND OF FARE WILL BE MADE ON ANY ACCOUNT WHATEVER BECAUSE OF FAILURE ON YOUR PART TO OBTAIN A CERTIFICATE. Should you neglect to obtain a certificate as the above conditions provide, you will be obliged to pay full fare both ways.

10. Last, but not least, it is recommended that those who wish to obtain certificates shall arrange to be at the ticket office a half hour before trains start, in order to receive proper attention from the ticket agent.

Several hotels in Portsmouth hav reduced their rates for those attending the American Secular Union Congress. The Briggs House will charge $2 per day; and several of the other hotels will charge only $1 per day.

We hope that our friends everywhere will make a special effort to be present at the Portsmouth Congress. This convention will be a turning-point in our history; and it behooves all good Liberals to strengthen the hands of the American Secular Union Congress, either in person or by representation through delegates. With the more thorough and widespread organization which this Congress, it is hoped, will secure, Liberalism can accomplish wonders this coming year; without better organization than we now hav, we may as well resign ourselvs, with closed eyes and folded hands, to be pushed to the wall by the encroaching ecclesiastical party.

Which shall it be, dear friends? It all depends on yourselvs, whether the cause of intellectual and religious freedom shall be helped or hindered for the coming year. With your aid—financial, personal, or by special delegation—we can make this a red-letter Congress in the annals of the American Secular Union. Will you not one and all help?

R. B. WESTBROOK,
Pres. American Secular Union.

Attest: IDA C. CRADDOCK, Cor. Sec.
Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 6, 1890.

The Rights of the State Over the Citizen, Parent, and Child.

The rights of the state stand preëminent. The state possesses the right of eminent domain over the property of its citizens. The citizen in undisputed ownership of property holds absolute and unquestionable title in fee simple only until the state sees fit to condemn it for public use, allowing a reasonable compensation.

But this must be for the public good. Private property cannot be condemned for church purposes, for that would be taking it for private purposes, not the public good. The church in this nation stands upon the same footing as the theater, manufactory, or any other private enterprise.

Though a sentiment prevails to some extent that the church should possess greater rights than other societies of entertainment for the people, the church is entitled only to the right, in common with other societies, to attend to its own affairs and let others alone. But it does not liv up to its natural rights. It encroaches upon every hand.

The public school occupies a plane immeasurably higher than the church. It is for the public good, not private, as the church or theater, to all who do not pay the contribution or entrance fee.

What right would the church or theater hav in demanding that portions of the Bible or Shakspere should be read as a prelude to instruction in arithmetic, grammar, geography, etc., or that a string of beads should be counted, crucifix kissed, an act of "King Lear" presented, or section of "Humpty Dumpty?"

It would be much more reasonable for the political party in power in each congressional district to introduce in the public school room a treatis on high or low tariff, for the political parties are of the state; the church or theater is not.

The faction of the Christian church that is Roman, in no sense American, has unconsciously done a good work in laboring to exclude the Bible from the American schools. This foreign ecclesiastical despotism deserves our hearty thanks in this one particular. The Bible is fast being relegated to its true field, the church, and such homes as desire it.

The Romans' illusiv hope that the "godless public school" would be superseded by the idolatrous papal, Methodist Bible-pounding, Baptist ducking, Episcopal nightshirt-gown, Presbyterian infanticide, Congregational what-is-it, or Mormon latest-inspiration denominational schools is a travesty on American nineteenth-century intelligence.

The priest in the United States, though a despicable creature, is an object of commiseration, for in his Jesuitical zeal he has advanced and elevated the condition of coming generations, that but for him would be compelled to listen to that exotic of the people's school, the traditions of Moses, Goliath, Christ, Barnabas, crazy John, and contemporary sheeneys.

A fundamental right and bounden duty of the state is to adopt such measures as will tend to perpetuate its own existence.

In a republican form of government, intelligence and thorough education is the bed rock and the only foundation upon which it can rest.

Compulsory attendance upon the state public school, with all parochial schools abolished, would be of the highest advantage to this nation. The Sunday-school is a proper and legitimate institution, the parochial school is not.

Secular education belongs to the state. Religious instruction to the church.

The state possesses rights over its inhabitants at all ages. It is the child's guardian as much as the father. It is more vitally interested in the education of the child than the father can be.

The state is even the guardian over the father.

How can the father dispute with his guardian?

If he will not send his child to school, would not the guardian of supreme power be derelict in its duty, and criminally negligent to the interest of society, by not compelling the child to attend school?

The parent is the natural guardian of the child. No other human being can occupy that position without his consent. In a state of nature no power on earth could, to any extent, possess a right over the child. But civil governments were instituted, and man surrendered to sovereignty many of his natural rights.

The citizen has gained by this operation, not only protection afforded to himself, but to his child.

The child's relation to parent and state cannot be better illustrated than by our form of government, or dual sovereignty, each state of the Union a father, the general government the state. The father decrees nearly all the laws and regulations; the state but few, and they supreme when in conflict with the father's mandates. The father has encroached upon the rights of the state ever since the formation of this government by withholding, to some extent, education from his child.

Is it not time that the state exerted its rights to the fullest extent?

Is there a time more propitious than now? With all superstition cast out of the then ungodless public schools, the child would be endowed with all his rights, and, on attaining his majority, would render unto his superior guardian through life a return commensurate with the benefits conferred upon him.

Lyons, Ia., Sept. 26, 1890. E. S. GIBBS.

The Preachers.

Ignorant and unconventional preachers sometimes display a candor anent "filthy lucre;" and, in my opinion, their sordid mendicancy is preferable to the hypocritical whining and masked beggary of cultured prebendaries and canons and bishops who accept "calls" from the Lord to less work and a richer living, and cantingly make light of the very object upon which their soul is set.

"Breddern," said an old colored pastor, "de chu'ch am like a ship, an' de pa'son, which am yo' 'umble se'vant, am like de sails dat propels de ship, an' de congregashun am like de sailors on board de ship. Now, breddern, we'n yo' hav de ship ready, an' de sailors all in dere places, and de sails all up, what does yo' need fer to make de sails fill out an' scoot de ship right along into de hebbenly ha'bor? Huh?"

"Wind," said old Deacon Topknot, in a low, sweet tone.

"K'rect; jesso," shouted the pastor. "Brudder Topknot will please circulate wid his high hat, an' raise de wind."

Now, this address has, at least, the ring of honesty about it, which covereth the multitude of its sins.

A broken-down divinity student I knew, suffering from desperate impecuniosity, called upon a once well-known Glasgow minister, and requested the gift or the loan of five shillings. The minister's income from working in the Lord's vineyard was a liberal one; but he replied, "I cannot afford so much."

The needy one abated the sum till it had come down to sixpence. "But," said he firmly, "my self respect has not even yet come so low that I can take less than sixpence."

"I cannot afford so much," quoth the stingy man of God.

"Then go to ——!" retorted the starving student; and he wheeled round to depart.

"Stay, my young friend," expostulated the stingy man of God; "silver and gold hav I none; but I can giv you something of inestimable value—I shal giv you my blessing."

"Keep your blessing to yourself," was the scornful rejoinder. "I had no food yesterday, and it seems I shall hav none to-day; but I cannot take less than sixpence. Your blessing must be worth less than that amount, or you would giv me the sixpence instead of the blessing. Keep both."

By the by, did you ever notice from their tombstones that parsons are saints to a man? Some of them are modest, and veil the record of their virtues from the multitude under an epitaphic veil of more or less Ciceronian Latin. But take the trouble to translate that Latin, and you at once become aware that you are standing over the moldering dust of a most extraordinary person, a perfect prodigy of learning, ability, and piety. You inwardly exclaim, "What a pity that no such person is alive now!" And then, bless my eyes, you discover that you knew the very man some ten years ago. Here he is Jacobus Muggenius; but you knew him as "old Jamie Muggins," a snuffy drone, whose sermons were drier than sawdust, and which would hav sent the very Sathanus himself to sleep—a person whom, not unjustly, scandal associated too closely with Robinson's wife and one of Smith's servant-girls, and who, it was more than whispered, looked upon—aye, and did more than look upon—the wine that was red in the cup. And here he lies with an inscription over him in lying Latin—an inscription which would hav been too good for even St. Francis Xavier or Bishop Pattison!

On a certain tombstone there is an epitaph, which, when translated from the Spanish, reads thus:

Here lies Juan Cabeca, chorister to our lord the king. When he was received into the choir of angels in augmentation of their happy company, his voice was so distinguishable from the rest that even God himself listened with attention, and at last said rather severely to the angels: "Hold your tongues, ye calves! and let Juan Cabeca, chorister to the king of Spain, sing my praise."

Every parson is more or less of a Juan Cabeca. It is too bad that, not satisfied with having spent their lives in telling us lies from their pulpits, they seem determined to spend their deaths in telling us lies from their tombs.—Saladin in Agnostic Journal.

The Facts of Prohibition.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will John W. Abbott, of New Cambria, Kan., inform a smiling world why he, a supposed Liberal, supports the People's party in that state—a party whose platform contains a God-in-the-Constitution preamble (as he admits), and whose nominee for governor is a rabid Prohibitionist, while the Democratic ticket is headed by that unflinching Freethinker and earnest anti-Prohibition conference worker, Charles Robinson, the honored "war-governor" of the state, who stands upon a platform containing an emphatic denunciation of ecclesiasticism in politics?

Permit me to say to Mr. Guild that when he accepts the statements of politicians like the late John A. Martin and of the Republican press of Kansas regarding the effect of Prohibition in Kansas, he permits himself to become a blind follower of tricksters and demagogs. He does not seem to catch a glimpse of the truth that Prohibition in Kansas is a party ism, that there are tens of thousands of Republicans who are theoretically opposed to Prohibition, and tens of thousands of others who publicly support it, while violating the law continually. But they all vote for it because the party, as a party, favors it. Once they revolted and elected Glick, and among the rebels was this John A. Martin. They will revolt again some day. Had the people's party this year not been controled in the interest of the Republican party, it would hav nominated Robinson, the Democrats would hav indorsed him, and Republican Prohibition would hav been buried in Kansas. What I assert regarding alleged Prohibition in Kansas is not based upon hearsay, but is backed by the close observation of years. Until a man has lived in a state where the face of Prohibition is on the boards, he cannot in the faintest degree realize how party worship, local pride, and other similar influences combine to cover up facts in regard to the open and covert sale of intoxicants. As an instance of this "conspiracy to deceive" I may mention the indignantly virtuous denial, made in a Kansan Alliance paper, of the statement that at two or three places in a town in the state whisky and beer were more or less openly sold. On the Fourth of last July the local editor of the paper and myself counted up thirteen places in that same town where such liquors could be procured. This man is no worse than thousands of others who giv life service to Prohibition, and yet finds it pleasant, even though a member and officer of the Good Templar's lodge, to help quaff on a hot day a bottle of beer which he has "chipped in" to purchase. He is the child of his environment, and no other environment is so demoralizing as that of Prohibition. It is the hotbed of hypocrisy.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Brooklyn Philosophical Association meets at Fraternity Rooms, Bedford avenue and South Second street, Brooklyn, E. D., every Sunday at 3 P.M. The lectures for the remainder of October are: Sunday, October 12th, Prof. A. L. Rawson, subject, "Symbolical Language in Religion and Art;" Sunday, October 19th, Mr. Henry Rowley, subject, "Jesus, Mill, and Spencer;" Sunday, October 26th, Mr. Percival Chubbs, subject, "John Henry Newman." These lectures are followed by discussion.

THE Manhattan Liberal Club has resumed its meetings at German Masonic Hall, 220 East 15th street (a little east of Third avenue), every Friday evening at 8 o'clock. The lecture for Friday evening, October 10th, is by Voltairine de Cleyre on "The Moral Obligations of Freethinkers." Miss de Cleyre is a lively and very radical speaker, and we prognosticate fun at that time. October 17th, Mr. A. L. Rawson will discourse of "Symbolical Language in Religion and Art," in his usual learned manner. October 24th, Dr. George C. Stiebeling will tell of "The Struggle for Existence in the Animal and Vegetable Worlds." October 31st, Dr. R. A. Gunn, president of "The Society for the Enforcement of Criminal Law" will inform us "How They Do It, or Corruption in Politics." If Dr. Gunn would change the latter part of his subject to "Corruption in Vice Societies," and get his secretary, Joe Britton, to add his information to that possessed by the lecturer, the discourse would be of unusual interest.

THE Christian Statesman uses this as an argument against Sunday breaking: "The county fair of Atlantic county, New Jersey, week before last, was held on Saturday, Sabbath [Sunday], and Monday. The attendance on the first and last days was small, but on the Sabbath so large as to make the total receipts larger than the management has had for years." Ordinary common-sense people will, we think, look at the matter just the other way.

WE received last week from the postmaster at Brocton, Illinois, a notice to discontinue sending THE TRUTH SEEKER to a man there, for the reason that "He is converted." We do not giv his name, as our books show that he owes us $4 75; and we call attention to the matter only to say that our subscriber need not hav sunk so low as to get converted in order to avoid paying his dues. He could simply hav cheated us out of it. As it is, we feel somewhat responsible for his fall, and if he will reform he can hav the $4 75. (We'll never get it, anyway.)

THE God-in-the-Constitution organ again waxes hysterical over the proposed Sunday opening of the World's Fair at Chicago. It says: "The struggle over the opening or closing of the World's Columbian Exposition on the Sabbath is likely to come sooner than was thought. In 1876 the policy of those who sought to open the Centennial exposition was one of delay. They strove to hush agitation. They refused to show their hand. They sought to allay apprehensions. They thought to avoid agitation until the exhibition was in progress, and then decide in favor of the open gates when it should be too late to arouse the country against their course. This line of action was plainly impossible in the present case. The Sabbath Reform work of recent years has been too vigorous, and the public mind was too alert, to allow it to be thought of. We are to hav, therefore, it seems, an early consideration and decision of the question. And there are grave fears of a wrong decision. One leading member of the commission, a man of immense wealth, has publicly committed himself to the Sabbath-breaking proposal, and has said he will spend thousands of dollars rather than see the effort fail. The local influence in Chicago will be overwhelmingly on the same side. All the forces of Secularism will array themselvs on the same side. A tremendous pressure will be exerted by those who will see immense chances for gain in the gathering of the multitudes on the Sabbath. The railroads will exert their powerful influence to this end. Let no one imagin that the interests at stake can be defended without a grave and costly struggle."

Obituary Notice.

Dr. James A. Bliss, the well-known editor and publisher of the Sower, passed on to the higher life Saturday evening, September 27th, at 9 o'clock. His death was peaceful and quiet, although he had suffered many weeks with general dropsy. A large number of relativs and friends gathered at his residence, 232½ Fifth street, Detroit, Monday, at 2 o'clock, to witness the last sad rites. Hon. L. V. Moulton, of Grand Rapids, Mich., gave a very fitting eulogy and timely address. The writer offered such words of consolation as the inspirers dictated, and though many denominations were represented, all were unanimous in their opinion that our philosophy was not only a good thing to liv by, but to die by.

Though foremost in the battle,
And thickest in the fight,
He will not be forgotten,
Now he has said good-night.

The Priests' Sisters.

[IT WAS IN THE GERMAN BARBER SHOP IN CLINTON PLACE AND A HOTEL WAITER WAS IN THE CHAIR. THE SUBJECT WAS, PRIESTS.]

The Waiter: "There was a priest in our place yesterday with a Sixth avenue disreputable woman, and I heard him introduce her to a friend who came in as his sister."

The Barber: "Yah, I myselluf saw one of dose fellows one day on a truck standing, watching the parade. His arm he haf round a vooman, and his head on her shoulder was. I ask him was dot a vay for priests to do? He said, Yah, dot was his sister."

Chorus of Customers: "You bet, they all hav sisters."

Individualism vs. Monkeyism.

Anyone who has at all observed the habits of monkeys, whether in confinement or their nativ haunts, cannot hav failed to notice how closely each one apes (no pun intended) the actions of the other. Let one run up a pole and soon one after another follows suit.

There are leaders among them as in the human race, and whatever these leaders do determins the actions of the others.

In this habit of imitation they in no wise differ from their exalted relations in human form, and to the thoughtful observer this monkeyism among human beings is a strong proof of the theory of man's ultimate descent (ascent) from some ape-like ancestor. Let the princess of Wales, the leader of fashions and follies in the British dominions, put her bonnet on back to front, or her jacket inside out, and all the society monkey ladies immediately follow suit. When the princess of Wales limped, owing to an accident while skating, young ladies, and even those who were no longer young, varied their usual mode of locomotion with a very decided jerk on one foot, known in fashionable parlance as the "Alexandria limp." The Mesdames Astor and Vanderbilt, the leaders of New York society, could make it the fashion here to wear tiger-skin clothing and a ring through the nose if they chose to set the example.

The masses of men are equally ruled by this monkeyism in human nature.

An excellent illustration of this tendency, though of course not true, appeared in a short skit in some of the leading papers. A dude had been having his hair cut at a fashionable barber's. As his dudeship was going out, the barber produced a bottle filled with some solution, which he commenced to wrap up for his customer, saying, "You had better take this with you, sir."

"What is that?" inquired the dude.

"A capillary eradicator," said the knight of the shears and razor, "warranted not to leave a hair upon your head."

"Good gracious, I don't want that!" exclaimed the dude.

"The prince of Wales is getting very bald, sir."

"Oh-h-h, in that case you had better giv me two, lest one should not hav the desired effect;" and the dude walked out with the bottles in his pocket, and an anxious look on his inane countenance.

In savage life we see this imitativness in far greater force than in the civilized races.

If a Feejian chief in his excursions stumbles or falls at any particular place, his followers, though they may number thousands, when they come to that place stumble or fall in like manner. Were one of them to omit doing so, he would immediately be killed for attempting such a daring innovation of the established custom of "imitation of his chief." So that in the inferior races individualism is sacrificed to monkeyism.

As we descend in the scale of existence, we find individuality becoming less and less. Animals possess more individuality than birds, for among birds one or two leaders control the whole flock. But at the very base of animal existence, such as the coral polyps, individuality has no existence. Millions are united in one community, and the individual is simply one of a group all working exactly as their ancestors hav worked from time immemorial, forming their stony structures at the bottom of the sea. So that the higher we ascend in the scale of existence the more individuality we find, until in the highly cultured individual, the man of science, we see the highest exemplification of selfhood. With him reason sits upon the throne of self and the monkeyisms incidental to human nature are subject to her sway.

A few centuries ago that decrepit old hag, the past, had raised a wall of superstition around the then known world, and inscribed upon it, "The end of the earth." But Columbus turned a deaf ear to her anathemas, and after years of perseverance and weary, patient waiting, launched his ships upon unknown seas, and for many anxious days and nights sailed steadily on. In spite of the lowering skies above and the tempestuous ocean around, in spite of the cowardly entreaties and even open mutiny of the craven crew who accompanied him, he accomplished his purpose and performed the most wonderful feat recorded in history by giving a new world to the human race. The Americans are here to-day because Columbus, defying the interdict of the Roman church, dared to assert his individuality.

To-day Spencer, Tyndall, Huxley, and a galaxy of talent are through their individuality delivering the world from ignorance and the bonds of social and religious bigotry, enlarging the domain of human thought, and scattering scientific truths broadcast upon the world. The world's heroes are men who diverge from the common types of humanity, and by their commanding and splendid individuality leave the impress of their minds upon the human race.

An eminent German writer of the present day says that women are stumbling-blocks in the path of progress, barriers to the advancement of the human race. Why is it that so many scientific men and eminent thinkers hold the feminin half of humanity in such low estimation? Because of the conservatism and want of individuality in women. The training which they hav hitherto received has been such as to turn them out like rows of pins in paper; no very great difference except that some were long or short, stout or thin, dark or fair. In colleges even at the present day, young girls are ground down to a tiresome sameness of sample, as if they were all turned out of the same mold.

In less civilized nations, where little or no individuality exists in women, men arguing from their mental inferiority deny that women hav souls. And when we contemplate the society girl of our civilization, who livs but to dress, posture, ogle, and giggle, we begin to think there may be some truth in the denial and wonder that any man, unless of similar mental caliber, would hamper his life with so much full-grown imbecility.

But these girls are not so much to be blamed as the artificial development which has made them what they are, creatures with the bodies of women and the minds of children. And men sneeringly point to their undeveloped mental powers as evidence of the capabilities or rather incapability of women. Woman has been too heavily handicapped in the race of life to be able to show for generations to come what her capabilities really are. Physical force has ruled the world in all ages, and woman being weaker than man has not been able to take her own part in the conflict for existence. The American boasts of equality, but he still denies woman a good many of her rights. Crowds of women hinder their physical development by fashionable attire, and dwarf their individuality into a contemptible sameness, and crawl in the dust at men's feet, in the hope of getting the shelter of a home, and being promoted to the social dignity supposed to be embodied in the prefix "Mrs."

A few years ago if a young woman ventured at all out of the beaten path of feminin monkeyism, she was immediately pointed at by both men and women, and warned if she valued her matrimonial chances to keep off the grass of individuality. Nowadays a good many of them hav dared to cultivate some originality and a good deal of self-reliance, and hav become daring innovators in all the walks of life hitherto held sacred to the lords of creation, and some of these women hav married and made good wives and excellent mothers. And those who hav not considered the security of single blessedness fully worth the chances of double wretchedness—these women hav been called "eccentric" and "peculiar," if they turn with weariness and irritation from the commonplace platitudes and silly twaddle which constitute the current conversation of society. "Eccentric," "peculiar," these are verbal missils by which monkeyism tries to stone out individuality in woman's nature; they are the charges which mediocrity is always ready to bring against talent, and which puppets of fashion bring against those who hav the hardihood to dress according to convenience and personal taste. When woman learns to cultivate her selfhood, to worship men less and respect her own self more, then she will be able to educate herself so as to attain that high destiny for which nature intended her, her true position as the intellectual companion and helpmate of man, the educator of her children, and holding every right that man is justified in holding. Then eminent men like Prof. Grant Allen will not write long dissertations to show that woman's place in nature is merely that of a reproductiv animal, and her mentality will no longer be considered by the sterner sex as a connecting link between the brain power of man and that of a child, and more analogous to that of the child than the man. But woman will never attain to this position until she becomes less conservativ in mind and action and cultivates individuality in herself, and then she will be able to realize there is no complete manhood or womanhood without.

If there is one phase of mental development more than another in which individuality should be cultivated, it is in matters of belief. For ages the world has been cursed and demoralized by the frantic efforts of different sects to shape its religious thought, each after its own particular model. And in deference to religious authority men and women hav tried to suppress their thoughts; strangling their individuality they eagerly drank of the turbid streams of religious superstition, thinking they were the waters of eternal life. Their minds fed greedily upon the theological husks which religious writers gave to them as nutriment for their starved souls. Each one had to suppress his individuality, for doubt was considered a greater crime than the most flagrant of moral atrocities, and accept with unquestioning credulity the teachings of priests. The religious world would never face opposition. It always preferred the physical force argument. It antagonized and tried to strangle all selfhood in matters of belief, until a ghastly terrorism dominated the whole world. Anyone who dared to utter a free thought suffered for it. Individualism was crushed in human nature by the cruel bonds which ignorant theologians bound around the minds of men. But there were always those whose individuality was greater than their fear of punishment in this world, and eternal torture in the next. The path of intellectual individualism is strewn with the wrecks of defeated dogmas and the remains of despised threats. What has been the history of the struggle between individualism and religious authority but the record of a long and awful tragedy, of terrible crimes committed against the noblest portion of humanity—a history of woe, of blood, and tears? But the selfhood innate in the noble army of martyrs who toiled, suffered, and died for the truths of science—that spirit of individualism which though crushed to earth maimed and bleeding rose ever again and again to confront with unflinching, menacing mien the soul-destroying dogmas of religious authority—when men and women cultivate individuality upon all matters, whether social, political, or religious, then they will possess that freedom of thought, that fearlessness of mind, without which no search for truth can ever be successful.

ADA CAMPBELL.

New York, Sept. 25, 1890.

Campaigning in Washington.

The consequence of persistent, earnest endeavor is manifest at Lynden, Whatcom county. A great change has been wrought in the sentiment of the community. At my first lecture, last winter, it was impossible to induce the ladies to put in an appearance at the Opera House. The prejudice against the Infidels was strong and bitter. Now our aims and objects are better understood. The organization of the Lynden Secular Union led to inquiry, and recognition of the fact that its members comprised many of the most respected citizens of the county. The action of the Washington Secular Union—to which the Lynden Union is auxiliary—in insisting on the school board obeying the law and putting a stop to religious exercises in the public school, impressed all with the fact that Liberalism was not confined to an isolated few, but was a powerful organization extending over the entire state, and press and public now recognize the fact.

The Rev. Mr. Hilton, a Baptist minister, arranged to hold discussion with me on Sunday afternoon, August 31st, at the Opera House. The question was of his own framing, "The Life and Teaching of Jesus Christ, the Truth of God." The reverend gentleman claimed great erudition, and experience as a debater, and had gained some seeming advantage over some of the Liberals by his avowed thorough knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, always declaring when cornered by positiv texts of scripture, "Oh, that is an error of the translator's; I find it does not read so in the original." I anticipated meeting an able and scholarly defender of his faith, but, alas! was doomed to disappointment. The reverend simply indulged in a Free Methodist camp-meeting harang. He offered no proof, made no argument; the nearest approach to it was his bald assertion that when in scripture we read "all" it does not mean all, but only "a few." I asked in vain for some evidence, or his authority for such a statement. I called his attention to the fact that it could hardly be the truth of God that Christ was born in a manger, as declared by Luke, if really born in a house, as declared by Matthew; that if immediately after the visit of the wise men, in obedience to the angel, Joseph took Mary and the child down into Egypt, and remained there with them till after the death of Herod, and it was absolutely necessary to flee into Egypt because Herod sought the child's life and went so far as to order the murder of all the infants in Bethlehem under two years old, in his intense desire to insure the destruction of Jesus, then the declaration of Luke that eight days after the visit of the wise men Joseph and Mary took the child to the temple at Jerusalem, and the high priest and prophets made great ado over the child, so that general attention was called to it, could not be "the truth of God." (Why did not Herod then cause the death of the child, since there could hav been no difficulty in finding him?) That Jesus could from the top of an exceeding high mountain, without even a field-glass or telescope, see all the kingdoms of the earth, on a round globe, could hardly be "the truth of God." That Jesus could hav come to the earth to be the savior of the world and yet emphatically declare, "I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xv), cannot be "the truth of God." That the savior of the world should declare he took pains to speak in parables to the gentiles so that although they might hear, they could not possibly understand—that he thus studiously concealed from all but Jews the plan of salvation "lest they should be converted and their sins be forgiven them" (Mark iv, 12)—does not sound like "the truth of God." That Jesus should command us to "search the scriptures, for they are they which testify of me" (John v, 39), that he should especially indorse Isaiah as scripture (Luke iv, 17, 21), and yet in that same Isaiah God the father over and over again utterly and most positivly repudiate the son, declare there never had been or should be any savior besides himself (Isa. xliii, 3, 4; xlv, 5, 6), is, to say the least, very strange, and it must be admitted these extraordinary contradictions can scarcely be accepted as "the truth of God." That Christ, having come on earth especially to die and thus pay the penalty of man's transgressions, should in the garden of Gethsemane, three times over, so piteously pray to his father that the cup might pass from him—that is, that he might not become unconscious for less than three days, although then he should be restored to life and be hailed as the redeemer of mankind—that he should prefer the eternal damnation of every human creature who ever had lived or ever would liv, rather than, with the promis of the father to resurrect him, he should risk dying, is, to say the least, a queer specimen of the "truth of God." That, instead of dying in all the triumphs of living faith, sustained by trust in God, Christ should so piteously, in abject, hopeless despair, avow his loss of all faith in God or his promises, crying aloud, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" does not seem to be "the truth of God." If the most perfect Christian conceivable—if this son of God, himself God—thus died in abject fear and hopeless despair, all hope or confidence in the promises of God abandoned, that we should take such a one as our example does not seem to be "the truth of God." That

> There is a fountain filled with blood
> Drawn from Immanuel's veins,
> And sinners plunged beneath that flood
> Lose all their guilty stains;

That we are, or can be, saved only through the precious blood of Jesus poured out on Calvary's cross, when we yet read the declaration of the beloved disciple John that Christ never poured out any blood till after he was dead (John xix, 33), does not appear like "the truth of God." That the blood of a dead man, or a dead God, not shed till he "was dead already," could atone for man's sins, will hardly pass among thinking, intelligent people as "the truth of God."

The reverend's attempt at reply was sadly rambling. He was badly disconcerted; said he could reply, could prove all he had said, but had not time; complained I had not replied as he expected I would hav done, and then drizzled into a Salvation Army exhortation to sinners to come to Jesus. He utterly failed to even attempt any refutation or explanation of the facts to which I called his attention.

Sunday evening, my wife, Mrs. F. C. Reynolds, delivered a lecture on "Woman, Past, Present, and Future," to a large and very attentiv audience composed of fully one-half ladies. On Monday evening her subject was "The Gospel of Humanity," delivered to a still larger attendance.

On Tuesday I delivered a short lecture on "The Origin of Life," after which we had a grand ball and supper, which was greatly enjoyed. The festivities were kept up with unabated fervor till the wee small hours. Sociability was promoted, and thus all became more interested in one another's welfare. One of the worst mistakes of the past was the neglect of Liberals to cultivate and provide for sociability.

While at Lynden we visited the ranch of that kindly, genial Liberal, "Father Lauckhart." He has a regular little paradise of a home. His good wife has a garden of superb flowers. The orchard is just beginning to bear, giving them luscious fruit in abundance. Red and white currants grow in immense masses on bushes trained against the corner of the house, from which removing two bushels of fruit made no perceptible diminution. Peaches, plums, pears, prunes, and apples are so abundant that the branches had to be propped to keep them from breaking off with the weight of the fruit. One apple-tree had been grafted by the oldest son as an experiment, and was bearing seven different kinds of apples.

Under the care and guidance of handsome I. A. Delander, whom even the dreary loneliness of old bachelorhood could not prevent from enlargement of heart and development of benevolence, we had delightful rides over the country. His kind care and provision for our every comfort rendered our work a mere light labor of love. On Wednesday morning he took us over to Roeder, Whatcom county, where we stayed September 3d, 4th, and 5th. Here, thanks to the self-sacrificing, indefatigable efforts of that whole-souled prince of Liberals, D. E. Rice, and his estimable wife and family, the flag of Infidelity is kept ever waving high above the cross. The Roeder Secular Union hav purchased an organ so as to cultivate musical ability and practice the songs of the "Cosmian Hymn Book," thus enlivening their weekly gatherings and adding greatly to the interest of future lectures. Mrs. F. C. Reynolds delivered three lectures. The following extract from the Pioneer Press tells the story:

> The course of lectures given at Roeder by Mrs. F. C. Reynolds were well received. The ladylike deportment and pleasant manners of the speaker, joined to her clear logic and unanswerable reasoning, commanded the fixed attention of the audience and elicited frequent applause. Her lecture on Thomas Paine was intensely interesting, showing that, aside from his religious views, his services to the American people deserved respect and gratitude, instead of scorn and calumny. A dance and supper followed the lecture on Friday night, which both socially and financially was a grand success. We hope in the near future to be favored with another visit from Mr. and Mrs. Reynolds.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Franklin Augustus Day Dead.

At his home in Castana, Ia., September 18th, died F. A. Day. He was buried on the afternoon of the 20th ult.

The funeral service was opened by the hymn "Then Do Right," sung by the choir. His son, Preston Day, paid the first tribute to his father's memory, saying:

Friends and Neighbors: Quite unexpectedly it devolves upon me to take a part in the services of this sad occasion. Perhaps it is needless to say that I am in no mood to speak much of that which is personal of my father. It fell to my lot to be with him during the last trying hours of his life and to close his eyes in death. I can only say now that my father died as he lived—fearless and free. He was conscious almost to the last moment. His mind was undisturbed by fear, unclouded by despair; there was no confusion, no uncertainty. He endured his protracted suffering bravely, and departed with the same manly courage which had characterized him during his long life. His last days reminded me of "Thanatopsis," the famous poem of Wm. Cullen Bryant, and I hav deemed it appropriate to be read at this time.

At the close of the reading of "Thanatopsis," Miss Rogers sang "Little Deeds of Kindness." Dr. J. R. Talboy, attending physician, then told of his acquaintance with the deceased, and the choir sang the hymn "Conscience." The benediction at the grave was pronounced by Dr. Talbot—a quotation from Colonel Ingersoll—and thus closed the career of one of the stanchest Freethinkers and most generous of men within Iowa's borders. THE TRUTH SEEKER has good reason to remember him, and our expression of sympathy with his family is sincere.

From the "History of Monroe County" we take the following biography of Mr. Day: Franklin Augustus Day, now a resident of the village of Castana, and one of the pioneers of this county, is a descendant of the English Puritans. His genealogical table commences with Robert Day, who was born in England in 1605, and came to America in the Hopewell, Captain Burdock, from London in 1624 Robert Day died in Ipswich, Mass., leaving a large family. John Day, of the fourth generation from Robert, married his cousin, Miss Sarah Day, and removed from Ipswich to Winthrop, Me., in 1795, with a family of five sons and three daughters. Francis, the second son of John Day, married Miss Elizabeth Hewins; they had two children, Francis Jerome and Franklin Augustus.

Franklin A Day was born July 9, 1809, in Kennebec county, Me. At the district school, the academies of Monmouth and Hallowell, and the Wesleyan Seminary of Readfield, he gained an excellent practical education. He started out in life for himself at the age of eighteen by working on his uncle's farm for $8 per month and board. Investing his wages in a watch and clothing, he taught a district school the following winter. He continued to teach for three winters and one summer, a part of the time at the large town school. In 1831 Mr. Day went into a general store in company with Laban Lincoln, at Hallowell, remaining about five years. During the next two years he was a member of the firm of Day & Jackson. The following year was spent in North Carolina, where he learned to detest that "peculiar institution" which John Wesley pronounced "the sum of all villanies." Returning to Hallowell he went into mercantil business agai.. Two years later his brother, Francis J., became a member of the firm, assisting to carry on the business about eight years. During all these ten years F. A. Day served as collector and treasurer of the old town of Hallowell, having been elected to that office in 1845. After living one year at Middlefield, Conn., and one year at Perth Amboy, N. J., he moved with all his family to Monona county in 1855.

F. A. Day married Miss Harriet Proctor Squire, who was the mother of four children, all of whom became school-teachers; all are married, all are now living in Monona county, and there are twelve grandchildren and five great-grandchildren.

Shortly after coming to this county our subject lost the greater part of his property by going surety for a friend. He fitted out at St. Charles, Ill., and came through with six oxen and a span of horses, camping on the Little Sioux river in December of the coldest winter ever known in Iowa. He bravely and energetically bore the hardships and privations of pioneer life. He was elected a member of the county board of supervisors for a number of years, and by his honest labors earned the gratitude of the people; he also served as postmaster at Arcola, and also at his store in old Castana. His occupations were various until 1878, when he became a member of the widely known firm of F. A. Day & Co. Five years later he sold out to Wm. T. Day & Co.; since then he has been leading a retired life, aiming only to settle up his past business affairs.

Although our subject is the son of a Baptist deacon he has never been a member of any church, or indeed of any society, secret or otherwise. Religiously he is, and has been, a persistent Freethinker. While of a domestic nature and habit, fond of games and amusements, he has opposed the use of intoxicating liquors and tobacco, and has never failed to bear testimony against saloons and all betting and gambling.

Mr. Day was a member of the old Whig party. His last vote as such was cast for W. H. Harrison in 1840. From that time until 1856 he was a Garrisonian Abolitionist and did no voting. There were twelve votes thrown in Kenebec township on that year by himself and others, all for John C. Fremont. Since that eventful date he has been a warm and devoted Republican, taking a deep interest in the public affairs of nation, state, and county.

F. A. Day has traveled the rough and thorny road of a wide experience, especially since coming to Monona county; his present position and success in life hav been achieved by persistent hard knocks. Despite the fact that he has been a vehement advocate, a rough and ready controversialist, his opponents hav not failed to giv him credit for honesty, ability, and sincerity. Kenebec township, or in fact, Monona county, contains but few citizens who are more widely known or more respected and esteemed than the gentleman of whom this annal is written.

What They Say About the Picture Book.

From the Denison, Texas, Gazetteer.

The Gazetteer has received from the Truth Seeker Company, New York, a copy of a large bound volume with the above title. It is a work of four hundred pages, with about two hundred full-page illustrations, and as many of letter-press. The illustrations, as a friend at our elbow suggests, truthfully represent church absurdities, priestly hypocrisy, and religious tyranny, and the degrading effects of practicing many of the so-called revealed commands. The book is really an unanswerable argument of symbols; it is folly sketched by reason. Watson Heston, of Missouri, is the chief artist, a name familiar to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The expression of his characters is so lifelike, and the true inwardness of the subjects selected so well shown, that the book is enough to make even a preacher laugh. The texts accompanying the illustrations are derived from reliable sources, often from scripture. The book is more than a collection of mere caricatures, it is a faithful illustration of falsehood and truths most ingeniously wrought out, every picture presenting an argument as convincing as it is entertaining. The price of the book is $2, postpaid, and a copy may be seen at this office.

From the Banner of Light.

The pictures in this volume, nearly two hundred in number, are remarkably expressiv in their forcible presentation of the radical truths it is their purpose to impart.

Old Testament Prophecies.

A friend from Utah writes:

"Some time ago a Jew and I were having a dispute about prophecies, and I called his attention to the many predictions of the Old Testament prophets which were unfulfilled. He denied that any prophecy made by them remained unfulfilled."

If our friend's Hebrew friend will turn to Isaiah, chap. vii, he will find, in the days of Ahaz, that the kings of Syria and Israel went up toward Jerusalem to war against it. The Lord sent Isaiah to comfort Ahaz and Isaiah made a prediction that a virgin should conceive and that,

"Before the child shall know to refuse the evil and choose the good, the land that thou abhorrest [Syria and Israel] shall be forsaken of both her kings" (Isa. vii, 16).

Then let him turn to 2 Chronicles, and he will find that Ahaz's God

"Delivered him into the hand of the king of Syria [and also] into the hand of the king of Israel, who smote him with great slaughter" (2 Chron. xxviii, 5).

Ahaz was defeated, one hundred and twenty thousand of his people killed, Jerusalem plundered, and "of their brethren, two hundred thousand women, sons, and daughters," carried away captiv. Paine rather severely comments upon this savage work: "Thus much for this lying prophet and impostor, Isaiah."

In Jeremiah is found this prophecy:

"Therefore thus saith the Lord concerning Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah: They shall not lament for him, saying, Ah, my brother! or, Ah, sister! they shall not lament for him, saying, Ah, Lord! or, Ah, his glory! He shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem. . . . He shall hav none to sit upon the throne of David: and his dead body will be cast out in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost" Jer. xxii, 18, 19; xxxvi, 30).

That this prophecy regarding Jehoiakim was not literally fulfilled is evident from 2 Kings xxiv, 6:

"So Jehoakim slept with his fathers [that is, in the royal sepulchers] and Jehoiachin his son reigned in his stead."

In Ezekiel xxvi the Lord said,

"Behold I will bring upon Tyrus, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, a king of kings from the north, with horses and with chariots and with horsemen and companies and much people" (v. 7).

"With the hoofs of his horses shall he tread down all thy streets: he shall slay thy people by the sword, and thy strong garrisons shall go down to the ground" (v. 11).

"And I will make thee like the top of a rock: thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon, thou shalt be built no more: for I the Lord hath spoken it, saith the Lord" (v. 14).

"I will make thee a terror and thou shalt be no more; though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again, saith the Lord" (v. 21).

This was another prophetical mistake. The prediction was that the city was to be taken and wiped out of existence. But religious and profane history both contradict it. Ezek. xxix, 18, says:

"Son of man, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon caused his army to serve a great service against Tyrus: every head was made bald, and every shoulder was peeled; yet had he no wages, nor his army, for Tyrus, for the service that he had served against it."

This is a plain confession that the attack failed for had it succeeded the army would not hav been in that plight. They could hav been paid from the spoil. Their failure is further evidenced by the statement in the next verse,

"Therefore [because of the failure to take Tyre] thus saith the Lord God; Behold I will giv the land of Egypt unto Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon; and he shall take her multitude, and take her spoil, and take her prey; and it shall be the wages for his army."

So much for "sacred" history. Profane history also evidences the failure of Ezekiel's prophecy. Greg, in his "Creed of Christendom," cites Heeren's "Researches," vol. ii, p. 11, and Grote, vol. iii, p. 439, as the "highest authorities" to show the non fulfillment of the prophecy. Another careful writer ("Ezekiel's Prophecy Concerning Tyre," in THE TRUTH SEEKER) cites these facts: "Josephus, who had access to histories not now extant, never intimates that such an event took place. Not a Greek or Roman author whose works hav descended to us makes any allusion to it. Writers in the latter part of the fourth century A.C. stated distinctly that there was no reference to the capture of Tyre by the Chaldeans in the historical writings then in existence of the Greeks and Pheniceans; and Jerome, the Christian father, while noticing this fact, was unable to adduce any authority to disprove it. It is now generally conceded by historians and biblical scholars that there is no proof that the Chaldean monarch was successful in his siege of Tyre, but that there are very strong reasons for the conclusion that the city was not captured by him. Tyre continued to be a large and important city for centuries from the time of Nebuchadnezzar. In the year 332 B C, it was besieged for seven months, and finally taken by Alexander the Great. It was then populous, wealthy and strongly fortified. Thirty thousand of its inhabitants, we are told, were sold as slaves. It was subject to the Macedonian kings of Syria until the Romans took possession of it in the year 65 B C., down to which time and afterward it continued an important and prosperous city. The accounts of Strabo and Josephus leave no doubt that, in the time of Augustus, it was more populous than Jerusalem. Its prosperity seems to hav been uninterrupted from the first to the fifth century A.C. According to Jerome, who wrote about 414, the city in his time was 'the most noble and beautiful in Phenicea.' He was perplexed to know how to reconcile its existence in his day—a thousand years from the alleged date of the prophecy—with the words of Ezekiel, that it should be destroyed and be 'built no more.' During the Arabian revolution that took place under Mahomet, it was again the subject of conquest, but its capture by the Khalif Omar did not put a period to its existence. When, five hundred years later (1144), it surrendered to the Christians, it was still a beautiful and flourishing city, and so continued down to the close of the thirteenth century, or eighteen hundred years from the time the Hebrew prophet said it should be destroyed by the Babylonian king and never be rebuilt. It was recaptured by the Saracens in 1291. Since that time, it has experienced fitful revivals of prosperity, but has gradually declined, until it is now reduced to a town of about five thousand inhabitants. It is now known by the name of Sour (or Sur)."

But again is Ezekiel discredited—in his prophecy that because Nebuchadnezzar could not get Tyre he should hav Egypt (Ezek. xxix, 19, just quoted), and in this Jeremiah was equally at fault, for he says to the Egyptians:

"Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold I will send and take Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, . . . and when he cometh, he shall smite the land of Egypt, and deliver such as are for death to death; and such as are for captivity to captivity; and such as are for the sword to the sword" (Jere. xliii, 10-11).

Ezekiel said:

"No foot of man shall pass through it, nor foot of beast shall pass through it, neither shall it be inhabited forty years" (Ezek. xxix, 11).

If anyone will point to any period in Egyptian history when this prophecy was fulfilled he will put the clergy, including the Jewish rabbis, under great obligations to him. Paine dismisses it with the words, "This is what never came to pass, and consequently it is false"—a very natural conclusion! Dr. Arnold in his "Sermons on Prophecy" (p. 48) fully agrees with Paine, so does Greg (p. 129), and so do all other truthful historians.

Jeremiah made, also, another error in his prophecy concerning Babylon. In his book, chapter xxv, he says:

"And it shall come to pass when seventy years [of Jewish captivity] are accomplished, that I will punish the king of Babylon, and that nation, saith the Lord, for their iniquity, and the land of the Chaldeans, and will make it perpetual desolation."

Isaiah, also, must share the responsibility of the error, for he said:

"And Babylon the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. It shall never be inhabited, neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation; neither shall the Arabian pitch tent there; neither shall the shepherds make their folds there; but the wild beast of the desert shall lie there, and satyrs shall dance there. And the wild beasts of the islands shall cry in their desolate houses, and dragons in their pleasant palaces; and her time is near to come, and her days shall not be prolonged" (Isa. xiii, 19-22).

Of this Greg says: "The captivity cannot, by any fair calculation, be lengthened out to seventy years. The chronologies of Kings and Chronicles do not quite tally; but taking that of Jeremiah himself, the desolation began in the seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar, B.C 599, was continued in B.C. 588, and concluded in B C. 583. The exile ended some say 538, some 536. The longest date that can be made out is sixty-six years, and the shortest only forty-three. To make out seventy years fairly, we must date from B C 606, the first year of Nebuchadnezzar." The "perpetual desolation" which was to take place at the end of seventy years, never occurred as predicted by the seer, as even in its most desolate phase "a few Jews lingered among the ruins." We will quote from Layard's "Nineveh and Babylon:" "After the defeat of Darius and the overthrow of the Persian supremacy, Babylon opened its gates to Alexander, who deemed the city not unworthy to become the capital of his mighty empire (p. 454). The last blow to the prosperity and even existence of Babylon was given by Seleucus, when he laid the foundation of his new capital on the banks of the Tigris (B C. 322). Only a few Chaldeans continued to dwell around the ruins of their sacred edifices (p. 455). Still, however, a part of the population appear to hav returned to their former seats, for in the second century of the Christian era, we find the Parthian king Evemerus sending numerous families from Babylon into Media, to be sold as slaves, and burning many great and beautiful edifices, still standing in the city (p. 455). In the time of Augustus, the city is said to hav been entirely deserted, except by a few Jews, who still lingered among the ruins (p. 455). Amid the heaps that marked the site of ancient Babylon herself there arose, in the seventh century, the small town of Hillah (p. 455). Hillah may contain about eight thousand or nine thousand inhabitants. A few half-ruined mosques and public baths are its principal buildings. Its bazaar supplies the desert Arabs with articles of clothing, arms, dates, coffee, corn, and contains a few Manchester goods and English cutlery—around the town and above and below it for some miles, are groves and palm-trees forming a broad belt on both sides of the river (p. 457).

A theory, put forward first by Colonel Rawlinson, I believe, that the ruins around Hillah do not mark the sight of the first Babylon, has, I presume, been abandoned (p. 456). Hillah, like most towns in this part of Turkey, is peopled by Arabs once belonging to different tribes, but now forgetting their clanships in a sedentary life. They maintain, however, a friendly intercourse with the Bedouins, and with the wild inhabitants of the marshes (p. 417). From the summit of Birs Nimroud I gazed over a vast marsh, for Babylon is made 'a possession for the bittern and pools of water.' In the midst of the swamps could be faintly distinguished the mat huts of the Kazail, forming villages on the small islands. The green morass was spotted with flocks of the black buffalo. The Arab settlements showed the activity of a hive of bees (p. 427). Shortly after my arrival at Hillah, I visited the Birs Nimroud, accompanied by Zaid, and a company of well-armed Agayls. Spying a party of the Kazail Arabs retreating from the marshes with their tents and cattle, they fell upon them, and under my shadow carried off a few cows and sheep, inflicting at the same time some severe lance wounds upon the owners" (p. 422).

"Thus we see," says the writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER referred to, "that the city which was to be destroyed by a great army 'from the north country,' the city whose time was near at hand, whose days it was declared should not be prolonged, which was to be 'perpetual desolation,' after the Jewish captivity, and never to be inhabited nor dwelt in from generation to generation, where the Arab was never to pitch his tent even; the city which was to 'be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah'—was a large and important city after the prophecies were written and after the captivity of the Jews; that Alexander intended to make it the seat of his great empire; that afterward it declined gradually like other ancient cities, yet 'Jews still lingered among the ruins' in the time of Augustus; that in the second century of the Christian era, it still contained inhabitants and 'many great and beautiful edifices still standing;' that at a later date Hillah rose on the site of the ancient city; that the town has now a population of from eight thousand to nine thousand, and is peopled chiefly by Arabs; that other portions of the ground on which ancient Babylon stood are inhabited by Arabs whose settlements show 'the activity of a hive of bees,' while all around the green morass is spotted with flocks of the black buffalo; and that a British traveler actually saw Arabs with their tents retreating from the marshes, which form a part of the site of the old city." Surely Isaiah and Jeremiah were mistaken about the wild beasts and the dragons in the houses and palaces.

In Gen. xlix, 10, is this prophetic assertion:

"The scepter shall not depart from Judah, not a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be."

This was said in the palmiest days of Judah, by Jacob, on his death-bed, and is by the Jews regarded as referring to the messiah. But if the Jewish messiah has not come, what becomes of the prophecy, as Judah (the Jews) hav no scepter, no kingdom, no country, but are scattered to the "four corners of the earth?"

Hosea was also a prophet. When he was threatening Israel with destruction for its impiety he prophesied of the tribe of Ephraim:

"They shall return to Egypt."

But chapter xi (verse 5) informs us that:

"He shall not return into the land of Egypt."

This is what might be called double-back-action prophecy. It works both ways, or neither way.

Another error of Isaiah's is this:

"Behold, Damascus is taken away from being a city, and it shall be a ruinous heap" (Isa. xvii, 1).

Yet Damascus is to this day the most flourishing city in those countries. This prophecy was alleged to hav been made about 741 B.C., and the city has been in existence ever since, and has now two or three hundred population. It is one of the sacred cities of the Mohammedans.

Again was prophet Jeremiah mistaken—in the prophecy he made to Zedekiah regarding that king's captivity, seeing the Babylonish king, and his death. Read:

"Thus saith the Lord, the God of Israel. Go, and speak to Zedekiah king of Judah, and tell him; Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will giv this city into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall burn it with fire. And thou shalt not escape out of his hand, but shalt surely be taken, and delivered into his hand: and thine eyes shall behold the eyes of the king of Babylon, and he shall speak with thee mouth to mouth, and thou shalt go to Babylon. Yet hear the word of the Lord, O Zedekiah king of Judah; thus saith the Lord of thee, Thou shalt not die by the sword; But thou shalt die in peace: and with the burnings of thy fathers, the former kings which were before thee, so shall they burn odors for thee; and they will lament thee, saying, Ah, lord! for I hav pronounced the word, saith the Lord. Then Jeremiah the prophet spake all these words unto Zedekiah king of Judah in Jerusalem" (Jere. xxxiv, 2-6).

But instead of Zedekiah beholding the eyes of the king of Babylon, his own eyes were put out before he was taken to the king, and he could not see. Instead of dying in peace, his sons were slain before him, before his eyesight was destroyed, and then he was bound in chains and died in prison. No odors are recorded as being burnt, as at the funeral of his fathers.

Another prophecy, made by the Lord, we are told, is found in Gen. ii, 17:

"But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die."

But Adam ate and lived on for nearly nine hundred and thirty years, and then died of old age!

And in the next chapter (Gen. iii, 14) is another error. The Lord said to the serpent:

"Upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life."

Who ever heard of a snake eating dust?

In Gen. xiii, 15, 16, the Lord prophesied:

"For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I giv it, and to thy seed forever. And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth."

But Abraham and his seed did not possess that land forever. For two thousand years they hav possessed no land at all. And they hav never been as the dust of the earth. Even a New York census-taker of 1890 could number them at any time.

The Lord also said to Abraham, in Gen. xv, 18:

"Unto thy seed hav I given this land, from the river of Egypt [the Nile] unto the great river, the river Euphrates."

But the Jews hav never possessed land on the Nile! Why?

And if these are not enough failures of prophecy, by the Lord through Moses and the other prophets, here are some more unfulfilled predictions by the same gentlemen:

"For the Lord will hav mercy on Jacob, and will yet choose Israel, and set them in their own land; and the strangers shall be joined with them, and they shall cleave to the house of Jacob. And the people shall take them, and bring them to their place, and the house of Israel shall possess them in the land of the Lord, for servants and handmaids; and they shall take them captivs whose captivs they were; and they shall rule over their oppressors. And it shall come to pass in that day that the Lord shall giv thee rest from thy sorrow, and from thy fear, and from thy hard bondage wherein thou wast made to serve" (Isa. xiv, 1-3).

Has that come true? Hav the people brought the Jews to their place, and become their slaves? Hav all the Jews ever been out of their hard bondage? Are they out of bondage, to-day, in Russia?

Again:

"Thus said the Lord God: Behold I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land. And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all, and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all. And David, my servant, shall be king over them, and they shall hav one shepherd. They shall also walk in my judgments, and observe my statutes and do them. And they shall dwell in the land that I hav given unto Jacob, my servant, wherein your fathers hav dwelt, and they shall dwell therein, even they and their children, and their children's children forever, and my servant David shall be their prince forever" (Ezek. xxxvii, 21-26).

Has the Lord done as Ezekiel prophesied? Are the Jews one nation? Are they any nation at all? Do they walk in the Lord's judgments and observe his statutes? Do they dwell in the land the Lord gave to Jacob, wherein their fathers dwelt, or are they scattered everywhere? Hav they a prince David, or any descendant of prince David, to rule them?

Again:

"Moreover I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own and move no more, neither shall the children of wickedness afflict thee any more as aforetime."

Hav the children got a place of their own? Do they move no more? If that is true our immigration statistics need revision. Are they not afflicted in Europe, and hav they not always been afflicted with persecution by Christians—"children of wickedness?"

Again:

"At that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord, and all nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem. . . . In those days the house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I hav given for an inheritance unto your father" (Jer. iii, 17, 18).

This prediction is clearly stated, and means that Jerusalem was to be the headquarters of the world. Is it?

If we were to write of the prophets as well as of their prophecies, we should probably offend our friend's Jewish friend. We will therefore only point out that, like the pagan oracles, the Hebrew prophets were fanatics; that the same Hebrew word signifying "to prophesy" means also "to be mad;" and that among themselvs they regarded each other as madmen—an idea to which their frequent habit of going about naked, and the performance occasionally of still more disgusting ceremonies, greatly contributed (see Greg's Creed of Christendom, p. 127). But it is evident from the instances we hav cited that the Hebrew prophets were not always reliable. It is, we think, capable of just as plain demonstration, that of real prophecies none that were not in the power of man to foresee hav ever been fulfilled; that the very few which seem to hav been fulfilled were written after the events occurred; and that, as Mr. Kelso says, whether fulfilled or not fulfilled, none hav ever been, or ever can be, of any service to the world.

SINCE Mr. Harman's release from Lansing penitentiary on a writ of error he has received the following notice:

"MOSES HARMAN, ESQ., Sir: You are hereby notified that the indictment found against you at the April term of the United States Court at Topeka for mailing and causing to be mailed the copy of Lucifer containing the O'Neil letter will be for trial at the October term of the United States Court which meets at Leavenworth on Oct. 11, 1890. P. L SOPER, Asst. U. S. Atty."

This has the appearance of being persecution. As the writ of error is to be argued in November his enemies would only hav been doing the decent thing to wait the issue of that argument before trying him on the other indictments. Mr. Harman proposes, in the near future, to remove the publication office of Lucifer to Topeka, Kan.

THE Freethinkers of Oregon, who are holding their annual state convention to-day, are circulating the following petition:

"To the Legislature of the State of Oregon: The constitution of our state provides that 'no money shall be drawn from the treasury for the benefit of any religious or theological institution. The general principle of American government is equality of all men and all property before the law; which, as your honorable body are aware, involves the principle, already acknowledged in theory, of the total separation of church and state. But your petitioners would respectfully submit that the exemption of church property from taxation is exactly equivalent to 'drawing money from the treasury for the support of religious and theological institutions;' since such exemption necessarily lessens the amount of money paid into the treasury, and the deficiency must be made up by increased taxation upon other kinds of property. To remit the legal obligation of an individual or an institution is to enrich the one or the other to the extent of such obligation, and this is what exemption of church property amounts to. As it is manifestly unjust that one individual's taxes should be augmented that another's may be reduced, so it is equally unjust that other kinds of property should bear increased burdens in order that church property may go free.

"The undersigned, citizens of Oregon, do therefore respectfully and earnestly petition your honorable body that justice be done by an early repeal of all laws or parts of laws exempting church or other ecclesiastical property from its equal share of taxation."

Copies of this petition may be had of C. Beal, Portland, Ore., and every advocate of justice should send for some of them and obtain as many signatures thereto as possible.

MR. JOSEPH BYRON, of 242 Cleveland street, East New York, called to see us last week to report one of the meanest acts of the season. Mr. Byron is a plasterer by trade. He is also an English Secularist. The plasterers hav an organization to which it is necessary to belong in order to be allowed to work. Mr. Byron applied for admission in the "Long Island Lodge No. 1 of Operativ Plasterers," and was given a permit to work for a week, when he was to be taken into the fold. At the Lodge meeting Mr. Byron was asked to "promis to be faithful to the rules of the society, so help me God." As an Atheist Mr. Byron objected to these latter words. Then the officers said he could not join, as they would hav no Atheists in the society, and the majority of the members (imported Irish Catholics, Mr. Byron calls them) supported the officers. Some American-born Irishmen took Mr. Byron's part, but they were too few to effectivly aid him. The officers sent word to the societies in New York, Jersey City, and Williamsburgh, and now the English Secularist is debarred from laboring at his trade in any of these cities unless he "rats" it, which he does not like to do. The question most agitating his mind is whether the imported Irish Roman Catholics own the country?

HAMBURG, N. Y., Sept. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 for the picture book. A well-to-do friend of mine furnished the money. We want to keep it in a cigar store for the general inspection of the public, and hope it will be the means of getting a number of subscribers for book and paper. Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, JOHN NUESSLE.

NATIONAL HOME, WIS., Sept. 25, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I hope that among the multitude of TRUTH SEEKER readers there may be some who would inform me what Burns meant by the "rye, through which Jenny draggiet a' her pettie coatie." And also who "Racer Jess" was in "The Holy Fair." I hav no commentary on Burns, and one astounding savant here says "Racer Jess" was one of the "twa or three" lewd women who "were blinking at the entry," and also ran foot-races. NELSON HUNT.

ROSLYN, WASH., Sept. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6, for which send me three copies of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." This makes nine copies that I hav ordered. Perhaps I can order more by and by. It is a book without a peer of its kind. Those cartoons should be on a continuous sheet of paper and be revolved by clock-work in show-windows, where they would do an immense amount of missionary work.

Very truly yours, HENRY BEICHLING.

LEXINGTON, ILL., Sept. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $2, and send me the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." I hav taken your paper several years and intend to take it as long as I liv. It expresses my views and I love to read its contents, and would giv liberally to hav a Liberal lecture in this place. I hope you will begin to hav Mr. Heston's pictures put in the paper again. I love them very much. I hav my subscription paid to 1892, but am ready and willing to pay more if the pictures are reinstated. S. C. COONS.

ANTRIM, N. H., Sept. 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: That Methodist clergyman that you spoke of in your last paper that advised Colonel Ingersoll to tell something different to the public from what he really believed, and to keep his real thoughts to himself, was the nearest like God of any minister that I hav ever heard of, for God, according to the Bible, chose a lying spirit to accomplish one of his hellish works, and the ministers hav to lie like hell to get their living, and their God says: "You are a good one. Go ahead and entice them." H. B. RALEIGH.

COVELO, CAL., Sept. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed money order for $2. Please send me one copy of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" by return mail, and hurry up the Freethinkers' Pictorial Bible, designed by Watson Heston. If I had one I expect I would feel that I was ordained to preach a little gospel to the poor Christians of this place. and I believe I could convert all that are worth saving. I keep on file back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, principally on account of the Bible pictures, and when I receive a copy without them I hav a feeling of sad disappointment, although the paper is full of the very best of reading matter, very interesting—especially your "Letters from Friends" are excellent.

I am glad to hear that Brother Heston is recovering. It is a pity we hav not many more of his ability. Superstition is old and tough, and requires chain-shot to hav any effect. It subsists on ignorance, the mother of all crimes.

Yours for truth and liberty forever, IRA C. HOXIE.

BRONSTON, KY., Sept. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to indorse heartily a piece in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 20th by William Wellington, of Nashville, Tenn. If Liberals in every village, where they could muster as many as a dozen members or more, would rent a hall or a room, and organize on the basis of Mr. Wellington's new creed, and then be careful not to let the organization die of the want of a little money to defray necessary expenses—I say, if we would do this we would in a very short time astonish the world at the rapidity of our growth. We would try to teach the laws of nature and the best way to govern society while in this world. We would let every member believe as he could. We would not fetter the young mind with the cruel dogma that it must believe certain things or be cast into a burning hell after this life, to which there would be no end. We would try to teach the truth about everything. I believe a man and his wife, with sons and daughters educated to be truthful, honest, just, and true, to be the corner-stone upon which to build the highest and best human society. The truth about anything is what everybody wants, except the orthodox preachers. The truth would destroy their business, and I believe all of the Talmagian order know it, but they will never be willing to giv up their big salaries. J. N. BROWN.

HANNIBAL, MO., Sept. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Among the resolutions passed by the late convention of Canadian Liberals, was one expressing sympathy with the American Secular Union "in its efforts to destroy superstition."

This indicates a misapprehension of the object of the Union, which is simply the separation of church and state.

The American Secular Union, as its constitution declares, is "non-sectarian."

Any person who favors the separation of church and state, whether he be Jew or Christian, Spiritualist or Materialist, moralist or debauchee, is welcome in its ranks, just as he is in the ranks of other political organizations.

It is true that many of the members of the Union are anti-superstitionists, and belong to the Brotherhood of Moralists, which makes the overthrow of superstition one of its main objects. It is also true that very many members of our Secular Union are exceedingly superstitious. I can go almost any evening and find a score or more of them sitting in a "dark circle," gripping each other's hands, watching for ghosts to appear. Heston left this scene out of his picture in THE TRUTH SEEKER of February 1st, probably because so many of the American Secular Union are in love with this kind of superstition, and a majority of the balance let it pass because the devotees are Liberals.

Combating the church usurpation of civil powers is good, but eradicating superstition is the first step toward the real elevation and liberation of mankind. A. R. AYRES.

LETCHER, CAL., Sept. 18, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Among other good letters from friends in the last TRUTH SEEKER was one from Mr. C. L. James which seems to me to strike the key-note of true Liberalism, and what is required of those calling themselvs Liberals. The time has come when all who feel the wrongs caused by the false teachings of the past must come to the front and battle for truth and freedom. True, "a general attack may take place all along the line," but the sooner the better, that truth may come uppermost and justice be done. The race can most effectually be improved by wisely preparing good conditions for true and loving motherhood and antenatal life. Most ills and crimes can be traced to heredity, and many suffer and are put to death for wrongs inflicted on them ere they saw the light of day. To show up these wrongs and their causes, is what Harman and Heywood were trying to do. It seems strange to see the moral blindness as well as cowardice of some who claim to be reformers. They are ready to desert the ranks if a leader falls or is wounded; when it should be that moral heroism should be displayed even above the noble daring of physical warfare.

As gunpowder when invented made the foot-soldier equal to the cavalry, so the press puts woman nearer on an equality with men. Women hav been called inferior to men because they could not fight with musket and sword, but now in the present conflict wherein the weapons are the tongue and pen, which require moral rather than physical courage to wield, may it not be hoped that women will not be found lacking in this true courage so necessary in all progress and reform?

Remember, it is woman's welfare and elevation that is being fought for, and the men who assist her should receive all honor and encouragement. L. HUTCHINSON.

BARRE, MASS., Sept. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to make a correction in John P. Guild's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER, September 27th.

Wendell Phillips was not a "presidential candidate," but candidate, in 1870, for governor of Massachusetts, heading a full temperance party ticket, the first ever nominated in the state.

We had not gone so far, then, as to call ourselvs a "prohibitory party," though our political opponents cursed us as such.

Neither were we all Infidels. The editor—Rev. E. P. Marvin—of our campaign paper—the Boston Daily News—was a Congregational minister, and most of the officers and members of the Massachusetts State Alliance—to whom credit should be given for the origination and financial support of this temperance political party—were Christians; but, as Wendell Phillips was stigmatized an Infidel for his antislavery principles, it was thought detrimental to the party, and "smart," to slur it as an "Infidel movement."

As Mr. Guild saw fit to introduce my name, I hope it will not be considered too personal if I add an item or two.

While I do not flatter myself that I was much of an "orator," yet, during the last two months of the campaign, I made over fifty speeches in as many different towns scattered through a vast territory, beyond the Hub, over the famous Berkshire hills, and all alongshore.

And this was the first party attempt to put temperance into politics, or politics into temperance, to my knowledge. But soon, very soon, the astute theologians discovered it was too good bait not to seize for proselyte angling, therefore church kindling-wood was artfully manufactured from temperance splinters; and as your humble servant worked for temperance for humanity's sake, not for Christ's sake, she fled the fraternity rather than lead dupes into superstition, instead of winning victims away from their cups.

ELLA E. GIBSON.

BOWIE, TEX., Sept. 25, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 20th inst. an open letter to Charles A. Dana, dated New York, September 6th, signed "G. N.," in which the writer uses the following language: "When Jeff Davis and his pals were buying and selling their own mulatto daughters and sons in slavery, and outraging the persons of their own pretty mulatto daughters and those of their neighbors in servil concubinage."

Now, I think the writer either never lived in the South and has been wrongly informed, or is guilty of knowingly misrepresenting the facts in the case. For one to read such vile stuff, such misrepresentation, as the foregoing is, would lead the young to think that perhaps their fathers or grandfathers were guilty of such conduct; the writer, whoever he is, leaves the impression on the mind that such conduct was a common affair. While I admit that, in a few instances, illegitimate children were "borned," so there were among the whites, north, south, east, and west. In some instances slaves were sold and bought by their own fathers, but so long as they were slaves, they certainly had the right to sell or buy them. The people of the South thought they had a right to buy and sell the negroes, which they did, and they did so so long as they had the right, which no reasonable man can object to. While I am no advocate of human slavery, yet I do not consider all who by circumstances lived and owned slaves in the South, to be guilty of such immoral conduct as "G. N." would lead the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to believe. It grates upon the ears of every true citizen, either South or North. Such expressions are born of hatred to the South. The war has been over for twenty-six years, and such vile slander is wholly uncalled for. I doubt if the writer ever lost an hour's sleep in defending the beautiful mulatto maids that he imagins were so cruelly outraged.

He also refers to the lamented and life-honored Jeff Davis, and classes him along with the seducers. Such words and vile slanders should be resented by every true Liberal, North or South.

It is certainly doing a great injustice to knowingly override, outrage, and misrepresent the people of the South, as "G. N." has done. And I think the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be ashamed to see such vile stuff in print, especially when it comes from a man that claims to belong to that grand brotherhood of Freethinkers, a brotherhood with no boundary lines, no north, south, east, or west; no by-laws, but the unwritten code of fraternal love and friendship. Yours for truth, S. P. BENTON.

IPAVA, ILL., Sept. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am in receipt of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." I am surely pleased beyond expectation. It is grand, it is amusing, it is instructiv, it is entertaining. To think of the wonderful imagination of Mr. Heston is food for the mind, and carries one almost into ecstasy, and it is indeed pleasing to know, to realize, that some of the finest drawings are painted from the thoughts and beautiful word-pictures of Paine, Ingersoll, and others, proving conclusivly that man is dependent upon man, not God. What a grand mother Mr. Heston must hav (if living)—surely a woman of fine artistic taste, though possibly not developed from lack of opportunity. Such women should not be forgotten. To giv to the world such a son is worth more than all the prayers ever offered, because there is a reality in Mr. Heston, while there is not, and cannot be, any in prayer. To be the doting mother of a son who is able to paint such beautiful truths, is to be greater than a queen. Look at the picture and you cannot help seeing the difference between the mother superior and the superior mother. How true the painting of both; what a blessing is one, what a curse the other; one is the home painted by our own Ingersoll, the other is well represented by Russia's Tolstoi; one advances and perpetuates the human race in stature and intellectual beauty, the other blots out everything that points toward culture and the perpetuation of humanity; one is life, the other death. I hav written the following lines on the first leaf of my "Text-Book:"

A close study of the pictures in this book, associated with your historical knowledge, will not only be a pleasure, but a very instructiv lesson, and, instead of dark forebodings, you will see a new light which will enable you to see more than you hav ever dreamed. It will strengthen morally and giv you judgment that you may pity those who are blinded by superstition. For this blindness there is but one ointment that is soothing—reason.

Very truly yours, C. S. RANDOLPH.

NEWCASTLE, WYO., Sept. 26, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav received so many inquiries from friends in the East regarding this new paradise that I hav concluded to publish a succinct and reliable account of the town and surrounding country. This is not a new country, as many suppose, but is quite as old as Massachusetts, Hindoostan, Indiana, or Jerusalem. It is the town that is new, and not the country, or vices and wickedness of the people. I am now in Newcastle, and know whereof I write from actual observation and experience. This town is due north of Denver about two hundred and fifty miles, about twelve miles from the South Dakota line, and about sixty miles from the northwest corner of Nebraska, in what are known as the famous Black Hills. These hills are immensely rich in nearly every mineral, and the vastest coal fields in the world, and the coal is of the finest quality. There is plenty of gold, silver, copper, tin, asbestos, lead, iron, etc. Newcastle is only fourteen months old and has one of the best railroads in the world, the B. & M., thus giving the town and country direct connections with Omaha, Kansas City, St. Louis, and Chicago. This is a good stock country, and the dairy business pays immensely; also, this is a splendid place for the poultry and egg business. Truck or vegetable farming along the streams where irrigation can be used would pay largely. There are about five hundred people here, and about five hundred miners in the coal mines seven miles from here. There is plenty of work here the year around at good wages for all who want to work. There is a great demand here for good girls for hotel and general housework. Any workingman can come here and in two years, if he attends to his business and lets drink and gambling alone, can hav a good house of his own and be comfortably well off. A person with a little capital can soon make a fortune here. There is a great demand for money and houses, and anyone who will build stores and houses here will be sure of big returns on his investment. There is one good hotel here, and several restaurants and boarding-houses. A fine school-house is in course of construction, and the city is putting in water-works and grading and paving the whole town. There is considerable of pine and cottonwood timber here. The climate is fine, with cool nights all summer. The altitude is 4,500, and it is a very healthy place, with good water. The famous hot and mineral springs of the Black Hills are about fifty miles from here. The B. & M. railroad is rapidly building its lines further west and north. This enterprising road will soon push their line through to the Pacific coast, and north to Deadwood, Dak., where they will connect with the F. E. & M. V. road. The B. & M. runs first-class trains here from Chicago with only one change, and that is made in the Union depot at Lincoln, Neb. There are no churches here yet, but two sects hold meetings. The town has ten saloons and gambling hells, which are the curse of the town and whole surrounding country. There is also one variety theater that is an eyesore and black ulcer to the town. Several companies are boring for oil and gas. Large quantities of surface petroleum hav already been found. In fact, everything flourishes here but figs and the Damnation Army. There are three newspapers, three doctors, three lawyers, one photographer, seven hundred gamblers, and two sky-pilots.

In coming here from the East, be sure to come over the Burlington road from Chicago, as that is the only road here, and in coming from the South take the Burlington road at St. Louis or Kansas City. There are plenty of Liberals here, but no organization. DR. C. W. MCCORMICK.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Sept. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: While I was in the village of Delhi, N. Y., as a summer boarder, I noticed an Episcopal chapel costing $38,000—a single donation. A leading merchant wishing to show me the local sights offered to take me into the chapel any morning, as he had a key to the door. I replied that I admired the architectural features of the exterior of the chapel but that I did not wish to inspect its interior, because, as a Freethinker, I look on churches and chapels with disfavor—as being productiv of much superstitious teaching and ceremonial nonsense.

"I think very much the same way," was his reply, that astonished me.

His father, a senior warden of the church, had reared his son a strict church-member, probably because he could not afford to lose the local patronage of the Christians, but at middle age I find the son "very much our way."

So many men support the church and uphold religion through selfish interests alone. It apparently helps them in business. Such men may be reached by Freethought influence some day, but it is easier to reach their children. Secretly? Yes, by lending, giving, and mailing copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other reform literature to the boys, girls, and young people. This is the way I was radically influenced, and I am happy for every illusion that has been dispelled, and for every new truth learned through Freethought channels.

Secret or carefully guarded work on Freethought lines is correct when it is a matter of honest policy. All endeavor and work for moral reform, whether it be open or secret, is commendable, and brings to the approving conscience an intense gratification, a true reward, such as no savior or God can bestow.

As regards public work, it is a fact that in localities where the people are sectarian and narrow-minded it means failure in business for a man to openly declare himself a Freethinker.

But I would not hav reform truths introduced in any underhand or dishonorable way, believing that our moral ideas, in order to be effectiv, must be advanced in a moral manner by moral persons.

THE TRUTH SEEKER and its publications are most excellent mediums for propagating reform ideas, and so are the land and labor newspapers and magazines. A good plan is to buy a book like the "Pictorial Text-Book," and lend it to some member of a family. The bigoted parent, usually the mother, or old maid, may frown and rave, but she does not dare to destroy the volume. When the book is returned, lend it elsewhere.

This book is well calculated to stimulate thought, excite humor, and confuse the superstitious Christian till he sees the falsity of all religion; moral truths then fill the brains of investigation and reason.

I am pleased to see the continuation of Watson Heston's pen-and-ink sketches in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Very truly yours, ED. J. KIMBALL.

SILVER PLUME, COL., Sept. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Some time ago Mr. Chapin asked the following questions in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I hav observed that but few hav given answers. These questions are pertinent ones, and everyone should at least ask them of himself and endeavor to find the true answers to them.

I herewith giv my answers and would like to hav the opinion of TRUTH SEEKER readers as to how near I hav come to the truth.

Question. What evidence hav we of any God?

Answer. We hav no evidence of any personal or Bible God. We hav the evidence of reason that there is a supreme power which controls or governs the universe. This power may be called "God," or "nature," just as one likes. I prefer the latter term.

Q. What evidence hav we of immortality?

A. None.

Q. What authority can one man rightfully hav over another?

A. None. We were "created free and equal."

Q. How is the rule of the majority any less destructiv to freedom than the rule of a monarch?

A. It is not. All rule is destructiv to freedom.

Q. What right does a man hav to what he does not earn?

A. He has no right to what he does not earn, except what is voluntarily given to him, or what he finds and cannot find the owner of. If this great truth was fully recognized, there would be an end to involuntary poverty.

Q. What right has any man to hold vacant land out of use?

A. Most emphatically, no right whatever.

Q. What right does one man, or combination of men, hav to monopolize the issue of money?

A. They hav no right to do so. Under present social systems it is expedient to hav government regulate the issue of money.

Q. On what grounds can compulsory taxation be enforced?

A. On the grounds of force. There is nothing right about it.

Q. Are interest, rent, and profits earned by the receivers?

A. Rent of land is never earned by those who receive it. Rent of improvements is; it was earned by the improver when he made them. Interest on capital that has been earned is earned by the receiver in the same manner. He earned it when he earned the capital. Profits may be regarded as interest on capital, or wages, or both, and are earned.

Q. Can they be collected without force?

A. They generally are. Perhaps the knowledge that there is "force," and that it can be used, has something to do with it.

Q. What right has a policeman to use force?

A. None. It is sometimes expedient for him to do so, though.

Q. What right has any man, or any body of men, to interfere with the absolute freedom of the human race?

A. None whatever.

Now, Mr. Chapin, let us hav your answers.

A. B. CLARK.

ST. ELMO, TENN., Sept. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am very glad indeed that Mr. Heston has caught a renewal of health. I hope he has also caught his long-lost monkey. I hav missed that monkey more than I can tell. I hope to see his work again soon on both pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I shall soon send for the "Text-Book," illustrated. My album has been an educator to some and a holy terror to others.

The Golden Rule, of Boston, asks, Shall the Chicago fair be opened Sundays? and then with gospel gush and pious prattle answers in the negativ. But it certainly answers for only a small minority. I am sure the vast majority of the citizens of the United States would say: "Certainly; open it on Sundays, and let the working men and women of the city hav a chance to view its wonders. Of course, open it on Sundays, the only day of the week when the brain and brawn of the city can visit it. Yes, open it on Sunday if it has to be closed all the rest of the week."

The fair is not for dudes and preachers, but for the benefit of the brain and muscle of the land, for the creators of wealth and homes, for the human levers that move, beautify, and enrich the world.

And Sunday is the only day when the great army of toilers in workshops and factories, stores and offices, can attend, and it should be opened to them if all others are excluded.

This is a secular nation, and the fair is a purely secular institution, and if religious cranks and pious bigots will let the fair alone, the fair will not interfere with them.

If a man has scruples against attending the fair Saturday, or Sunday, or Wednesday, let him stay quietly away and not interfere with those who wish to attend those days.

Sacred time? Why, that is sacred time when a man can do most for himself and those dependent on him. That is sacred time when the mind can be broadened and enlarged, whether it be Sunday or Wednesday. If that can be done by visiting the fair on Sunday, then by all means render Sunday sacred, by opening it to all the sons and daughters of toil on that day.

I can assure you God knows nothing about the fair, or Chicago either. And if he did, according to tell he is strong enough and old enough and ugly enough to close it up if he wanted it closed, without any aid from his self-appointed agents.

There is one hundred thousand persons, quiet and intelligent, in the city of Chicago who cannot attend the fair unless it be opened for them Sundays.

I would like to see a total separation of church and state, by a repeal of all Sunday laws.

I hold that any law that is good for Tuesday and Thursday is good and sufficient for Saturday or Sunday. A law that is good for New Year's, Decoration Day, Fourth of July, Thanksgiving, or Christmas, is good enough for Sunday.

Sunday ought to be a day for recreation and rest; for visiting, picnics, excursions, conventions, and elections. If the Presbyterians receive rest and pleasure by prostrating themselvs before an imaginary being without body, parts, or passions—a great big hole through a little chunk of nothing—by all means let them do so. If some one else receives rest and recreation by howling like a maniac to an imaginary triple-headed, monstrous monstrosity, well and good, so they do not disturb their neighbors. But the great mass of people will find their rest and pleasure in refreshing their minds and muscles, in visiting fairs, libraries, museums, lectures, and athletic and intellectual entertainments of every kind. The day of the Gods is past. The era of man has arrived. Let man be glorified by a visit to the fair, especially Sunday.

And now in this connection I desire to make a suggestion. It would be a fine thing, a paying investment, for the villages and cities within say two hundred miles of Chicago to raise a fund, by subscription if possible, by tax if necessary, to send the young men and women of their places, who are not able to pay their own way, to the fair one or more Sundays during its continuance.

Let the young people feel that wealth and power take an activ interest in their welfare. I do not know of any way in which it could be shown so cheaply, and hav its effects so lasting, as by the plan indicated. No doubt the railroads would make more than usually low rates for such a purpose.

L. L. GOODWIN.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Sept. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Your selection from the Twentieth Century headed, "Mr. Pentecost Agrees With Mr. Tolstoi," suggests a thought to me. The thought is this, that the "Kreutzer Sonata" is not a lecture but a portrait. If Emerson was right in saying that to be great is to be misunderstood, then Tolstoi should be the greatest man living. For he is surely the best misunderstood. Of all Tolstoi's critics, I hav yet to meet with one who does not assume that Posdnyschew speaks for Tolstoi. Now, let us consider this. Tolstoi was a famous novelist before he became a famous metaphysician. The creativ instinct in him is far stronger than the analytic. His writings upon abstract subjects always, even in spite of himself, ran to the poetic form. Such an author is by no means to be identified with his characters. Posdnyschew is a character whom Tolstoi has created. To assume that Posdnyschew's words are Tolstoi's is the same sort of error which it once was to abuse Mr. Pecksniff's reasonings as Mr. Dickens's. What sort of a character is Posdnyschew? Everyone who has read the "Kreutzer Sonata" must at once reply that his ruling passion is self. His crime is no accident. It is a perfectly normal product of his disposition. In all situations he is the same. Whether laying down the law to the mixed company in the railroad carriage, pluming himself on his morality while living the life of a sensualist, finding out that children are a source of unhappiness, nursing his jealousy which "makes the meat it feeds on," murdering his wife, or telling his story, he appears equally an egotist in the full sense of the word, equally devoted not merely to pleasing, but to admiring, analyzing, talking about, thinking about, himself. After the murder his morbid self-consciousness takes the form of self-justification, which is required as the motiv of his long confession. But nothing would ever hav pleased him like a close chamber and a good listener. Such a man might naturally be expected to tell some pungent truths. It is quite in harmony with dramatic propriety that the author should put some ideas of his own into the mouth of Posdnyschew. Goethe has unquestionably put some of his own into the mouth of Mephistopheles. But to assume that the whole philosophy of a character purposely made so odious should be accepted as the author's, is to betray a lack of critical appreciation. Nor would it be much better to attempt sorting the murderer's sentiments into two heaps and labeling one "Posdnyschew" and the other "Tolstoi." The "Kreutzer Sonata" is not a lecture but a portrait. The moral is not to be sought in this or that expression, but in the effect of the picture on the reader's sensibilities. The Posdnyschew type of man is not uncommon. It is seen in every ruffian who murders the woman who will not marry him, every husband who treats his wife as a Turk is supposed to treat an odalisque, every pseudo-moralist whose idea of marriage is that it affords a safe and respectable vent for passion, every morbid-minded wretch who favors the public with a nauseous autobiography.

There are also female Posdnyschews. Laura Fair was one of them. But this is not all. As there was an angel in Michael Angelo's block of marble, so there is in every one of us a Posdnyschew which we may develop, if we think that sort of moral culture profitable. And it is a kind to which we are being invited by various fashionable fallacies—notably by the hateful sentimentalism which in sundry countries, our own among them, has made jealousy a valid excuse for murder. Comstock laws, McCosh's morality, McFarland verdicts, are all potent Posdnyschew producers. The words of Hamlet come back to me with a new significance as I think of these execrable corrupters of the public conscience, these Belials masquerading in the stolen garb of chastity and honor. One "films and gilds the ulcerous place, while rank corruption mining all within infects unseen;" another "spreads the compost on the weeds to make them rank." For these reasons I can heartily "agree with Mr. Tolstoi" so far as to think the purpose of the "Kreutzer Sonata" not only moral but most timely. The Posdnyschew type of man needed to be exhibited in all its hideousness. The gospel of respectable, conservativ, regulated lust, with mistresses for youth, wives for middle age, preachers to consecrate its crimes, Judge Fosters to punish those who call them by their right names, and daggers and revolvers in reserve, required a Tolstoi to proclaim such truths as that its inspiring genius is sensuality, of which hate and cruelty are merely another phase; that these base passions hav crystallized themselvs in institutions, and degenerated into fashions; that their normal end is cynical asceticism; that they degrade woman, brutalize man, and degenerate posterity. Not, of course, that this is new. Shakspere felt it when he told us that Jacques, the censurer of mankind would do

> Most mischievous foul sin in chiding sin,
> For he himself had been a libertin,
> As sensual as the brutish sting itself;
> And all the embossed sores and headed evils,
> That he with license of free foot had caught,
> Would he disgorge into the general world.

Shelley felt it when he wrote:

> Life may change but it can die not;
> Hope may vanish, but can fly not;
> Truth be veiled, but still it burneth
> Love repulsed, but it returneth.
> Yet were life a charnel, where
> Hope lay coffined with despair;
> Yet were truth a sacred lie;
> Love were lust, if liberty
> Lent not life her robe of light,
> Hope her iris of delight,
> Truth her prophet's robe to wear,
> Love her power to giv and bear.

It has, however, a peculiar fitness for the present time. And to this, even more than to Comstock, Tyner & Co.'s advertising, I should attribute the success of the "Kreutzer Sonata."

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Boy of Boys.

She sat on the porch in the sunshine
As I went down the street—
A woman whose hair was silver,
But whose face was blossom-sweet—
Making me think of a garden
Where, in spite of the frost and snow
Of bleak November weather,
Late, fragrant lilies blow.

I heard a footstep behind me,
And the sound of a merry laugh,
And I knew the heart it came from
Would be like a comforting staff
In the time and the hour of trouble,
Hopeful and brave and strong,
One of the hearts to lean on
When we think all things go wrong.

I turned at the click of the gate-latch,
And met his manly look;
A face like his gives me pleasure,
Like the page of a pleasant book.
It told of a steadfast purpose,
Of a brave and daring will;
A face with a promis in it,
That, God grant, the years fulfill.

He went up the pathway, singing;
I saw the woman's eyes
Grow bright with a wordless welcome,
As sunshine lights the skies.
"Back again, sweet-heart mother,"
He cried, and bent to kiss
That loving face that was lifted
For what some mothers miss.

That boy will do to depend on:
I hold that this is true—
From lads in love with their mothers
Our bravest heroes grew.
Earth's grandest hearts hav been loving hearts
Since time and earth began;
And the boy who kissed his mother
Is every inch a man! —Eben E. Rexford.

Philosophical Reasoning.

DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS: The noble intuitions of Voltaire's genius are to be respected even at this time. He predicates mentality of refinement of sensation. Herbert Spencer intimates that physiological atoms, beyond the reach of chemical attraction, are the fittest for organization.

Bolingbroke asks, "When does matter begin to think? What causes the force and waste of the brain; the power of absorbents, and how it is that living bodies can secrete those substances necessary for their well-being?"

We must admit that the brain is an electrical pile, that the heat generated by this battery brings refined atoms into working order for sensation, which results in thought. No work without heat.

Electricity decomposes many substances, but, in an organized body, the passage of the electric fluid from the positiv to the negativ portion of the brain, givs a chance for a sensation, the next instant is stagnation, quicker than lightning another sensation. As Oliver Holmes observes, "Choose quickly which impression to detain, for they are all on the gallop." I would like more light on this subject. ALHAZA.

Scientific Reading.

A CAREFULLY SELECTED LIST THAT INCLUDES WORKS ON EVERY SUBJECT.

The best scientific works are often difficult to obtain by the independent student and interested reader. So many valuable scientific books are now offered the public that it is often puzzling to find just what is wanted or needed. The following list givs the best books on the subjects stated:

Physical Geography: Guizot, Marsh, Maury, Michelet, Rectus, and Somerville.

Physics: Arnott, Deschanel, Ganot, and Lardner.

Forces of Nature: Faraday, Guillemin, Buchner, Stewart, and Youmans.

Mechanics, Dynamics, and Engineering: Ball, Ewbank, Lardner, Rankin, and Todhunter.

Acoustics: Blaserna, Helmholtz, and Tyndall.

Optics: Brewster, Lockyer, and Tyndall.

Spectrum Analysis: Lockyer, Roscoe, and Schiller.

Microscopy: Beale, Carpenter, Frey, Gosse, Hogg, Lankester, and Somerville.

Heat: Tyndall, Clark, and Box.

Electricity and Magnetism: Faraday, Franklin, Jenkin, Hospitailer, Maxwell, Prescott, Schellen, Siemens, and Tyndall. Benjamin's "Age of Electricity" and Mendenhall's "Century of Electricity" are popular manuals.

Meteorology: Abercrombie's "Weather," Greely's "American Weather," Blodgett's "Climatology," Flammarion's "Atmosphere," and valuable government works.

Chemistry: Bloxam, Faraday, Fresenius, Liebig, Miller, Muspratt, Roscoe, Silliman, Wayner, and Watts. Roscoe and Schorlemmer's "Treatis on Chemistry," now in course of publication, is the fullest and latest presentation. The new chemistry has been well treated by Cooke, Eliot, Storer, and Remsen. For chemical analysis the works of Fresenius take high rank.

Astronomy: Airy (the astronomer royal), Arago, Ball, Chauvenet, Guillemin, Herschel, Kepler, Laplace, Lockyer, Newcomb, Procter, Somerville, and Whewell. Serviss's "Astronomy with an Opera Glass," and Langley's "New Astronomy," deserve high praise.

Natural History: Abbott, Burroughs, Thoreau, Jefferies, and Humboldt's "Cosmos" and "Views of Nature" are good in cultivating the love of nature and outdoor life. Darwin has left record of how much these authors had to do in giving him his love of nature. White's "Natural History of Selborne" has a more general interest than its title would indicate. Pliny, the elder, the father of natural history, should not be forgotten. Agassiz's "Methods of Study in Natural History" and "First Lessons in Natural History," Darwin's "Natural History" and "Geology of the Voyage of the Beagle," Gosse's "Romance of Natural History," Pouchet's "Universe" and "The Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation," the author of which since his death is known to be Robert Chambers, are books of interest.

Geology: Dana, Agassiz, Geikie, Miller, Murchison, Winchell, Page, Figuier, and Lyell.

Mineralogy: Dana and Phillips and Simonin's "Underground Life," a very interesting presentation.

Paleontology: Owen and Nicholson.

Botany: Asa Gray, Darwin, Hooker, Linneus, La Maout, Decaisne, Figuier, and Sach's "Text-Book of Botany," which is the fullest treatis.

Biology, Evolution, etc.: Darwin, Wallace, Haeckel, Huxley, and Romanes.

Ethnology and Archæology: Lubbock, Haeckel, Tyler, Waitz, Wood, Brace, Buchner, Latham, Lyell, Nott, Glidden, and Prichard.

Entomology: Figuier, Wood, Packard.

Ornithology: Miller, Merriam, Ingersoll, Burroughs, Ridgeway, Audubon, Coues, Jardine, Figuier's "Mammalia, Reptils, and Birds."

Ocean: Michelet's "The Sea," Figuier's "Ocean World."

Zoology: Agassiz, Buckland, Buffon, Cuvier, Gosse, Huxley, and Wallace. Jardin's "Naturalist's Library" in forty volumes, Kingsley's "Natural History," Wood's "Popular Natural History" and "Homes Without Hands," Packard's and Orton's "Zoology," are good works.

Looking on the Bright Side.

Uncle Billy Dawson, who lived in the house where Mr. Crounze was reared, was a kind-hearted man, who never lost a chance to hold out hope to the despairing and sympathy to the suffering. He was always ready with the proof that however hard a neighbor's lot was, it might hav been many fold worse, and his ingenuity at finding a recompensing gain for every loss that anyone might suffer was a matter of local wonderment.

One day somebody told Uncle Billy that his neighbor, Thomas Darrow, had fallen under the cars and lost a leg.

Uncle Billy stood in silence several minutes looking at the ground. Then, raising his eyes, he said: "Well, I'm awful sorry for poor Tom, but there's some consolation in the thought that a pair o' socks'll last him twice as long as they ust to, and to a man as poor as he is that's a good deal."

The next day Uncle Billy called on the injured man, and to his surprise learned that Tom had lost both legs. A little disconcerted, Uncle Billy stood by the bed in solemn consideration. Presently, however, his face brightened, and he said: "Well, Tom, if you had to lose one leg it's a mighty good job that you lost two."

"Oh, Uncle Billy," said Tom, "how can you say such a thing?"

"'Cause it's true, Tom, true as gospel. You see if you'd only lost one leg you'd be thinkin' about it an' worritin' about it all the time, but now, you see, the loss of each one'll serve to keep your mind off'n the loss of the other. It's a great blessin' you lost 'em both, Tom, 'stead o' only one."

Correspondence.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Sept. 16, E.M. 290.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Kind Friend: I once more take the pleasure of extending to you and the Cornerites my humble but heartmeant greeting. My heart overflows with rapturous joy when I realize the amount of good that the Children's Corner is doing, as an instrument of amusement and instruction in your hands. The children, who hav availed themselvs of the advantages derived from the Corner, owe you a debt of endless gratitude. I can say the above in truth, for I hav experienced the benefit of the Corner myself. I hav learned much by reading it as it appears each week in the grand old TRUTH SEEKER.

I am now engaged in reading Mr. Putnam's "Religious Experience," and I can say that, like all of his other writings, it contains many sparkling gems of thought. The style in which it is written is very attractiv, and cannot fail to interest anyone who desires to read it. I hav always recognized in Mr. Putnam one of the ablest living champions of Freethought, and his labors mark an era in the progress of the Freethought cause. Long may he liv to thrust the harpoon of his logic into the sides of old orthodoxy.

I like the poems of Mary Baird Finch, the Nebraska poetess, and I wish the Truth Seeker Company would publish a volume of them. She is a poetess of more than ordinary ability, and she merits the praise of every true lover of poetry.

So the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is ready at last! I say, Hurrah for Heston! He is, as Brudder Gardner says in one of his stump-speeches, "a whole hoss and team, sure." I was very sorry to hear of his illness, and I hav missed the cartoons in THE TRUTH SEEKER very much. I hope that he is now on the road to recovery.

In looking over a late copy of the Christian Evangelist, I find an article containing the following: "We take pleasure in cherishing the belief that skepticism is on the decrease in our country." And the Evangelist also says that this "is the opinion of some of the most competent judges, who hav had the widest opportunities of observation." But the Evangelist is mistaken. Skepticism is rapidly increasing, and some of the greatest theologians are deploring it. Rev. De Witt Talmage exclaimed, "Oh, we hav magnificent church machinery in this country. We hav sixty thousand American ministers; we hav costly music; we hav great Sunday-schools, and yet I giv you the appalling statistics that, in the last twenty-five years, the churches of God hav averaged less than two conversions a year each. There has been an average of four or five deaths in the churches. How soon, at this rate, will this world be brought to God? We gain two, we lose four. Eternal God, what will this come to?"

The archbishop of York says, "Infidelity, which was once confined to a small class of thinkers, seems now to be spreading everywhere." Bishop Gilmore writes, "Religion is fast passing away; forms and faith are losing their hold on the hearts of the people; Protestantism has run its course, and is now living on the past; it has no future; it is like the stately tree that has reached its end; it is dying at the top or split into fragments, and it no longer controls the masses. The crowds that hasten to listen to a Beecher preaching a religion without Christ, and applaud an Ingersoll preaching bold and open Infidelity, tell in words that find no contradiction whither we are drifting." I could giv other authorities, but the above is, I think, sufficient. Rev. Mr. Hastings, one of the greatest of living theologians, has written a book deploring the spread of skepticism and Infidelity, which I advise the editor of the Evangelist to read.

I hav written a longer letter than I expected to, so I will write no more at present. Wishing you and the readers of the Corner much success, I remain, as ever,

Fraternally, GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

[The appreciation of the Children's Corner by our friend inspires us to new effort in our chosen field of labor. To hav aided, in ever so slight a degree, in the formation of principles of one exhibiting so high a character as George J. Remsburg is something of which anyone may be proud. In making the Corner what it is, great credit is due to our splendid corps of contributors, without whose helping hands we could do little. Our grateful thanks are due them all, and conspicuous among them we number our bright, brave friend Remsburg. Some time in the future, we feel confident, some one who has means will come forward and advance the necessary funds to enlarge our Children's Corner to a Young People's Paper. We can then hav more space to express and impress our thoughts upon the rising generation. No one can doubt the good work that such a journal could be capable of doing. If we can save the children we save the nation —ED. C. C.]

THE TRUTH SEEKER also reprints from reviews and magazines the latest papers of such eminent writers as CHARLES BRADLAUGH, PROFESSOR HUXLEY, FREDERIC HARRISON, and other English Liberal writers.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S "Children's Corner," MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, has been elected senior member of the School Board of Fall River, Mass.

The Truth Seeker Gives all the News of Freethought, and is Always on Guard Against the Encroachments of Ecclesiastics upon the People's Liberties.

If you have any Ideas or Reforms calculated to benefit humanity write to THE TRUTH SEEKER (sending your subscription) and let the world know of them. THE TRUTH SEEKER publishes each week more letters from the people than any other paper in the world.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is devoted to the defense of Mental Liberty, of American Institutions, and the Preservation of the United States Constitution, so far as regards religious tests, and the maintenance of human rights. It advocates the abolition of all laws based on religion or religious observances. It demands the taxation of church property. It is uncompromisingly opposed to anything tending toward a union of church and state, either in name or in fact.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

DR. FELLOWS

Is a regularly educated and legally qualified Physician, and the most successful in his specialty as his practice will prove. Send 10 cts. for his "Private Counselor," a book for young and middle aged men, suffering from that Life-Wasting Weakness as the result of youthful follies, indescretions and excesses. It sets forth an External Application.—A POSITIVE CURE. The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those afflicted.

AN HONEST STATEMENT. "Similar advertisements from unreliable practitioners have been frequently assailed and exposed by the press, but Dr. FELLOWS stands foremost in his profession, and it is safe to trust him."—The National View.

Address,

Dr. R. P. FELLOWS,

VINELAND, N.J.

Inquiries are frequently received asking what we know about Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. First, we know that he is a reliable gentleman of rare professional skill, who has earned success by good work. Second, that he fulfills all his agreements to the letter. Third, that he has performed cures of hopeless cases that in the olden time his skill would hav been called miraculous. Fourth, and last, we know him to be an honest man and a stanch Liberal.—The Better Way.

News of the Week.

THE Indians of the Sioux reservation in South Dakota are much excited over the claims of a venerable medicin man who is developing himself, according to their belief, into the messiah they hav so long expected. He is over one hundred years old, and has secured many believers. The nearness of the winter season will, it is thought, prevent any trouble.

CORNELIUS VANDERBILT is pursuing Sunday-school work as a hobby with great energy.

REV. THOS. WILLIAMSON, of Markham, Ont., has fled after forging paper to the amount of $10,000.

THE New York Central railroad announces that it objects to its employees being Knights of Labor.

THE managers of the shrine of Lourdes, France, hav got physicians to visit it and attest the miraculous cures performed there.

IT is said that Dr. Justin Fulton will go to Montreal and there in the jaws of the enemy continue his war on the Catholic church.

AT Scranton, Pa., Anne Husaboe has recovered $3,000 in a breach of promis suit against Rev. Peter Roberts. He had seduced her, refused marriage, and denied reparation.

SEVERAL Japanese editors hav been sentenced to four years' imprisonment for speaking disrespectfully of the emperor Jimmu, who, if he ever existed. lived about six hundred years ago.

CATHOLICS complain of the frequency of robberies of churches at Rome. The Church of St. Andrea della Valle was recently robbed of 4,000 lire.

FAILURE of crops has caused an exodus from western Kansas of farmers, mechanics, and laborers, who hav mortgaged all they owned and are now abandoning it.

AT Rome the Catholics are enraged at the production at the Theater Costanzi of an "impious drama" containing an "indecent parody" of a religious procession.

ONE hundred and eighty Mormon elders and proselytes who arrived at New York from Europe on the 2d were met by Christian missionaries, who failed, however, to dissuade any.

CARDINAL TASCHEREAU refused to attend an entertainment given Prince George of England during his visit to Canada, because he could not hav a place equal or superior to the prince.

REV. JOS. BOTT, a Methodist minister of Tansboro, N. J., was assaulted on the night of the 1st by Rev. Robt. Rampas. The latter has disappeared, and with him the beaten man's wife.

CATHOLICS in Italy lamentingly report to friends here that the determined efforts of their enemies are obliterating all sense of religion from the minds of the younger generation of their lower and operativ class.

AT Rochester, N. Y., there is trouble over a young woman whose father is trying to keep her from convents, and priests who insist she shall enter them. The father recently dragged her from a convent by force.

WORSHIPERS at St. Paul's cathedral, London, on the 28th ult., were shocked by a man killing himself in the midst of them. He left a letter saying that he would commit suicide in the cathedral to destroy false Christianity.

ON Sunday the 28th ult. one of the factions in the Lutheran church at Ogden, Mich., found the building in possession of the rival party, who had established a railing and picket lines, while the worshipers inside were armed with guns and bayonets. The factions hav previously had disgraceful rows over the possession of three churches of the neighborhood.

A GREAT sensation has been caused in the public schools of Zanesville, O., by the refusal of the high school pupils to sing the "Venetian Boatman's Song," containing an invocation to the Holy Virgin, which is a supplement to the music book in use in the schools. The music teacher is a Catholic, and twenty of the boys hav published a card in the newspapers attacking her for her courses. The school principal was present with the teacher on the 2d and compelled the pupils to sing the song. A strong feeling has been aroused by the action.

Gems of Thought.

How you can overrun a country, climb any rampart, and carry any fortress, with an army of alert thoughts—thoughts that send their bullets home to heaven's door—with which you can take the whole world, without paying for it or robbing anybody. See, the conquering hero comes! You fail in your thoughts, or you prevail in your thoughts only. Provided you think well, the heavens falling, or the earth gaping, will be music for you to march by. No foe can ever see you, or you him; you cannot so much as think of him. Swords hav no edges, bullets no penetration, for such a contest. In your mind must be a liquor which will dissolve the world whenever it is dropped into it. There is no universal solvent but this, and all things together cannot saturate it. It will hold the universe in solution, and yet be as translucent as ever. —Thoreau.

A DISTINCTION was taken by Epictetus and other Stoics between things in our power and things not in our power. The things in our power are our opinions and notions about objects, and all our affections, desires, and aversions; the things not in our power are our bodies, wealth, honor, rank, authority, etc., and their opposits. The practical application is this: wealth and high rank may not be in our power, but we hav the power to form an idea of these—namely, that they are unimportant, whence the want of them will not grieve us. A still more pointed application is to death, whose force is entirely in the idea.—Bain's Moral Science.

MICHAL MAKETH A FEW SARCASTIC REMARKS.

Then David returned to bless his household. INTELLIGENCE is necessary for a free government, so that ignorance remains a national menace. Men must know their rights so as to maintain them, and to not demand more than their rights. The ignorant are liable, on the one hand, to be oppressed by tyrants, and on the other to be led into extravagances by demagogs. For self-rule there must be self-culture; and there should be intelligence enough in the masses to lead themselvs and not be led.—Bierbower.

DESPOTISM is the only form of government which may with safety to itself neglect the education of its infant poor.—Horsley

THE political and social conditions under which the people of the Roman states then [in 1831] lived could not hav been maintained anywhere in Christendom except by a government of priests. Only one-third of the soil was cultivated. The people were miserably poor. Employment was scarce and wages small. The country was overrun by brigands, whom government was powerless to restrain. The press was effectivly bridled; literature and science were discouraged. Vaccination was not permitted. There was no education for the poor; and it was said that only one person in a thousand could read. Enterprise was repressed; men lived hopelessly in that degraded position to which they had been born. When certain capitalists proposed to organize steam navigation between Rome and the chief towns of the sea-coast, the papal government withdrew its consent after the ships were contracted for. The origin and perpetuation of these evils are sufficiently explained by the circumstance that there was in Rome one ecclesiastic for every ten families. —Mackenzie's History of the Nineteenth Century.

WE appeal to the natural, not to the supernatural, for the accomplishment of our ends. It is with the modern civilization thus arising that Catholicism refuses to be reconciled. The papacy loudly proclaims its inflexible repudiation of this state of affairs, and insists on a restoration of the medieval condition of things.—Prof. Draper.

THE area of prayer will gradually be narrowed, as men learn to trace results to natural causes. They cease to ask God for things as fast as they learn nature's laws. No one prays that the sun may rise or that the seasons may change; and men are ceasing to pray for rain and wind and all other events, in proportion as they see that they are as inevitable as the sunrise, or else can be directed by their own knowledge. . . . Prayer has been the resort of laziness, and has often paralyzed efforts and lost the attainment of desires, while the devout person was "waiting on the Lord," instead of using his best efforts for himself.—Robt. C. Adams.

PHILOSOPHY FORCED TO CRINGE TO SUPERSTITION—GALILEO BEFORE THE CARDINAL.

Notes and Clippings.

THE vast majority of Queen Victoria's subjects (139,000,000) are neither Protestants nor Catholics, but Hindoos, while the Mohammedans, 40,000,000 in number, are themselvs more numerous than the Protestants of all denominations in the empire.

THE Mail and Express wants to abolish "the solemn declaration or affirmation made by those who declare that they hav conscientious scruples against taking an oath, and hav the simple Christian oath administered to everyone." Would it not be a good idea to turn the universe over to Shepard and let him run it for the benefit of his religion? What's the use of an almighty while Elliott is alive?

STATE'S ATTORNEY C. A. WORKS in his charge to the grand jury, which convened for the October term of the circuit court last week at Rockford, Ill., referred to the charges made by press and people against the self-styled divinity, George Jacob Schweinfurth, and asked the body to investigate them. It is probable that an indictment will be found against Schweinfurth. The sheriff has served papers on the dwellers in "heaven" to appear before the grand jury.

THE London Freethinker is anxiously inquiring as to the whereabouts of the Rev. Dr. S. Wainwright, the president, and Mr. Alexander Scott, the secretary, of a Society for the Suppression of Blasphemous Literature? Shortly after Mr. Foote's trial in 1883 these gentlemen wrote to the Times: "We propose to get up cases, as our funds will allow, against Professor Huxley, Dr. Tyndall, Herbert Spencer, Swinburne, the author of "Supernatural Religion," the publishers of Mill's works, the publishers of Strauss's works, Leslie Stephen, John Morley, the editor of the Jewish World, Dr. Martineau, and others, who by their writings hav sown widespread unbelief, and, in some cases, rank Atheism, in cultivated families." Alas! exclaims Mr. Foote, Messrs. Wainwright and Scott were not supported as they should hav been by a Christian world concerned for the defense of its faith. Otherwise we might hav by this time got rid of the Blasphemy laws. We are not even aware that Messrs. Wainwright and Scott ever published a first list of subscriptions.

OF the boycott on the Catholic Knight reported last week, the Philadelphia North American says: "It is rather late in the era of civilization for any representativ of authority, in the church or out of it, to fancy that he can control criticisms by using his influence to impair, or to interfere with, the business of his critics. That sort of thing is always a failure. So, without entering into any discussion of the deserving or lack of deserving of the newspaper called the Catholic Knight, we will set it down as certain that Bishop Gilmour, of Cleveland, O., has made a great mistake in pronouncing a comprehensiv boycott upon the editor who has offended him. If the Knight is a readable and popular journal, it will be benefited rather than hurt by this sort of attack. And if it is hurt, the publisher has a mighty good chance to recover from his reverend censor a round sum in damages, for this is not the age when the law will sanction the redress of private grievance or of offense against church discipline by any such method as has been adopted by the eminent and holy man, who is living a couple of centuries too late."

HOLY JOHN WANAMAKER'S city seems desirous of being ranked with Delaware and New Jersey. An item in the daily papers says: "I. N. Baker, private secretary to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, has encountered some difficulties in his attempt to secure a suitable hall in Philadelphia for the colonel's lecture on 'Art and Morality.' The lecture is designed to be a testimonial benefit to Walt Whitman, and art and morality are to be discussed, with the aged poet's works as a text. When application was made to the authorities of the Academy of Music, Secretary Bonnaffon, after communicating with Alfred G. Baker, president of the company, refused to let the Academy for this use, on the ground that Colonel Ingersoll could not be allowed to speak there. Mr. Baker then applied for the Union League Club annex, which Colonel Weidersheim declined to place at his disposal. Finally, Horticultural Hall was engaged and the lecture was arranged for October 31st. Alfred G. Baker said to-night that in the past few years Colonel Ingersoll's agents had made a number of applications similar to this, and that they had all been declined. He added that it had been a principle of the Academy Company throughout his presidency that no person should use their property for the purpose of advocating Infidelity and Atheism."

THE Catholic State Central Committee of Wisconsin has issued a secret circular in the German and English languages, directed to the Catholic clergy and such "good citizens" as are willing to defeat a law of the legislature of Wisconsin favoring the free public nonsectarian schools, as follows: "Reverend Dear Sir: In view of the great importance of the approaching fall elections, the undersigned Catholic Anti-Bennett Law State Central Committee respectfully asks your kind assistance in effecting a thorough organization of the Catholic voters of this state. In addressing our reverend clergy, we deem it proper to assure you that we are deeply convinced of the importance of the co-action of the clergy. We herewith again declare our firm adherence to the famous protest of our right reverend bishops against this unnecessary, offensiv, and unjust law. In order to procure a repeal of this act, it is, however, necessary, first, that Hoard, this fanatical enemy of our parochial schools, be defeated, and the Democratic ticket elected; second, that a safe majority for us be secured in the next legislature. To this end we ask your reverence to use your influence so that in caucuses in your parishes or missions, only such candidates will be placed in nomination as will pledge themselvs for the unconditional repeal of the Bennett law. We also ask you to furnish our committee with the names and addresses of several good citizens of your assembly district who would be willing to distribute pamphlets issued by our committee, and generally to assist in the work necessary in your district for the above purposes."

The Christian's India Rubber God.—Concluded.

There were cruelties practiced among the Mormons at which the most humane revolted. "Do you accept Mormonism as a whole?" was asked them.

"We do."

"Then you accept it in all its parts."

This is true of the Bible. The moment it is accepted as the word of God its cruelties, brutalities, and debaucheries are accepted, and pollute the clean chambers of the mind.

A loving couple had a child born to them, and before it was a year old it died. Another came to bless their home and it died also. Then they began to cast about to find out what they had done to cause God to visit them with such afflictions. They came to the conclusion that they had been too ardently attached to each other, and that between their love for each other and their strong attachment for their children, they had shut out God from their hearts. And until they allowed God to reign supreme in their affections, he never would allow a child of theirs to liv. Thus the Christian religion crushes out all the sweet juices of the human heart.

What could be more monstrous than the idea that God would get so jealous of a mother's love that he would kill the object of her affections? Is it any wonder the human mind is so bemuddled when people read in a book which they believe to be the word of God, that he commanded his chosen people to butcher these innocents because somebody else had offended him? Oh, the cruelty of the Gods! Oh, the cruelty of the creeds based upon every system of supernatural religion. Every system of religion which clips the wings of thought and smothers down investigation is the cruelty of slavery in one form or another.

How often is it repeated by Christians that every thing is ordered for the best. When the wife and mother dies and leaves a family of small children, the minister tells the husband that he must not question the ways of providence. That if he could see through all the plans of God, his seeming affliction would prove a blessing in disguise, for he orders everything for the best, and "doeth all things well." Is it any wonder that the world's progress has been so slow, when designing men can slabber over the people with such nonsensical drivel, and hav them accept it as the word of God?

"Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not neither do they reap, nor gather into barns. Yet your heavenly father feedeth them." The meaning of this passage is that God is so good and considerate to his children that he will supply all their wants, even if they put forth no efforts to provide for themselvs. Practically this is as great a lie as ever was written, and one more direful in its consequences, if adhered to, was never uttered. A thorough belief in the statement would depopulate the globe as soon as the present supply would be consumed. The world ought to be thankful that all men treat it as a lie, whatever they may profess.

Every Christian who plows a furrow admits it to be a lie. Every time he sows a handful of grain, he declares before the world that it is a lie. Whenever he gathers a sheaf of wheat and puts it into the barn, he shows that he believes it to be a lie. There is no race or class of people who dares to treat this passage as truth for a single year.

I am opposed to the Christian religion because it will not mind its own business. It is always trying to make everybody do as "I say." It locks men up in prison because they hav a way of their own. There are men in prison to-day, not because they hav injured anyone, but because they did not do as Christians dictated. It puts power into the hands of the few, and makes them proscriptiv and tyrannical, and reduces the many to a state of bondage. Christianity is not widely separated from a state of lunacy. On every other subject the Christian may reason correctly, but in regard to matters pertaining to his religion he is insane.

Whatever he may conceive to be pleasing to God, that he will do, although he may outrage humanity. He will visit the severest penalty upon an individual whom he believes to be the enemy of God. Women hav been whipped and dragged at the tail-end of carts, and men hav been imprisoned and burnt, not for offenses which they had committed, but because Christians in their insanity believed they had offended God. The abominable laws of New England were not passed in the interest of society, but to make men do as Christians dictated, in regard to what they conceived to be the will of God. And judged by the character of those laws he is a tyrannical monster.

It is strange that a man should get lost in his own house, but the circumstance has occurred many times. A man may become so bewildered that not a room, a door, or window is in its proper place. He starts in the night to go into a certain room and misses the door. He feels to the right when it is on his left, and gropes around the room, and finally passes through the door which he thinks opens into the right room, but it opens into the pantry. He is utterly confused. In regard to the rooms in the house he is insane. Upon every other subject his mind may be clear. He would cast up a column of figures or count money as accurately as ever. He is only insane in regard to the inside arrangement of that house.

I know a woman who was lost in the village where she was born and brought up, and passed her own house twice.

The streets were all reversed, the houses on the wrong side of the streets, and with mind bewildered she wandered about until a late hour. She left a store and inadvertently turned in the wrong direction. She walked some distance before looking up, and then by some strange transformation different buildings were found upon her street from those she had seen before. And not until she had been taken back to the store which she had left, and started in the right direction, could her mind be cleared of the hallucination.

From the time the woman left the store until her mistake was made known to her, she was insane to all intents and purposes in regard to the village in which she was lost.

The acuteness of the most subtil mathematician, whose mind has been trained to make the nicest distinctions, in such a case avails nothing, though he is just as able to solve the most intricate mathematical problems as ever, yet in such cases as cited above he is insane.

I hav, perhaps somewhat tediously, narrated the above instances of insanity occasioned by being lost, to show that such insanity arises from some mistake or misconception. In the case of the Christian the mistake and consequent insanity arise from a belief in a God which does not exist.

In the first place he believes in a God which is a spirit, that he is clothed with all power and knowledge, and that he designed everything from the beginning, and that he is merciful and good, and that all his requirements of men are written down in a book.

Starting wrong and believing himself to be right like one who is lost, it is impossible for him to reason correctly upon any subject with which he thinks his God has anything to do, and he becomes a monomaniac. And like the woman who was lost in her own village, there is no way to dispel the hallucination, only to conduct him back to where he made his first mistake, and show him, if possible, how it originated.

In the first place, if the Christian could be induced to take into consideration all the different beliefs which hav been entertained first and last in regard to his God, he would see that none other than an India rubber God could be squeezed into all the different shapes required by these beliefs.

He believes that God is a spirit without body or parts, and that he created everything. Also that man has an immortal spirit, and that when a man dies his spirit livs on. Just imagin how the spirit of a man after he is dead could affect a solid rock. The spirit of a man could create the rock of Gibraltar as well as the spirit of God or any other spirit.

Again, God designed everything. Then he designed the tornado as much as he did the gentle zephyr. Both are air in motion, but God has nothing to do with either.

Heated air is lighter than cold air, and rises for the same reason that cork rises in water. When a building burns, the heated air mounts upward, and as there is an atmospheric pressure of fifteen pounds to the inch, the cold air rushes in to fill the place of the heated air which rises.

At the equator the air is constantly being heated, and the cold air from the northern and southern regions is forced in to fill its place. Simply cause and effect—God has no more to do in this case than he has with the fire. The same cause produces the same effect. It is on a grander scale, that is all.

Now I hav given a general idea of the course of wind, but the Christian may require me to explain every phenomenon in regard to it. I reply, I am unable to do it. But it does not follow that God has any more to do with the operations of nature which I do not understand than he has with those which I do understand, and the help of his India rubber God is not required on account of my ignorance.

There can be no design where there is no designer. The phantom of design would wholly disappear, if Christians would consider how their design arguments cross and annihilate each other.

He designed the roots of a tree to hold it to the earth, and then designed a wind to blow it over. He designed certain animals to catch and devour certain other animals, and endowed the animals upon which they prey with faculties and cunning to escape.

"God is good." Yet he causes earthquakes and volcanoes and tornadoes to destroy millions of human lives.

"God is merciful." Yet he has constituted one-half of the animal kingdom so that they are the natural food of the other half.

"God is benevolent." Yet when he had the arrangement of all things, he allowed ninety-nine hundredths of the human family to suffer the torments of an endless hell.

The Christian is always harping about doing everything in the fear of God. Those men who do everything in the fear of God are the most dangerous men in the world.

Thousands of men hav been murdered and other thousands tortured in the most inhuman manner by men who acted in the fear of the Lord. Women hav been whipped, men burnt and banished, and all manner of outrages committed by men who feared God. Every officer who acts in the fear of this great indescribable nonentity will be influenced more by what he conceives to be the will of God than by the provisions of the Constitution, which he has sworn to support.

Very recently we hav had decisions from judges on the bench who under the influence of this hallucination hav given decisions which outraged the principles of justice and liberty. Here is the clew to the persecutions of the Jews now going on in Russia.

Such men are outside the pale of reason. They are sure they "ought to obey God rather than man." What is the reason of men, they ask, compared to the wisdom of God? And their idea of the wisdom of God is derived from an old book, which represents God as commanding some of the most diabolical acts which ever darkened the pages of history.

Reason is wasted on such fanatics. How can men be convinced of wrong when they hav God's word that they are right? Millions of men were slain in holy wars because it was believed that God sanctioned the slaughter.

But I hav pursued this subject far enough to show the cause of the Christian's insanity, and to lead his mind back, if such a thing be possible, to the starting-point where he made his first great mistake, which so unbalanced his mind that he could not reason correctly.

To believe in a great God, the creator of all things, who holds in his hand the destiny of unnumbered worlds, when no such being exists, is a mistake so great that it is no wonder that the minds of men are unbalanced, and many entirely reft of their reason.

If this first great mistake could so unhinge the mind of a great man like Herbert W. Morris, A.M., who holds a professorship in a college, as I hav shown, is it any wonder that the common herd should be so far beyond the reach of reason?

These thoughts are not thrown out so much in the expectation of convincing Christians as to teach Liberals that the whole fabric of Christian superstition rests upon the God idea, and that this is the point upon which they must train their guns. And that the war will never cease until the great "Quaker gun" of God's power is captured.

Take away the God idea and persecutions would cease, and museums and public libraries and places of rational entertainment and amusement will be open on Sundays.

Now, I hav tried to show in this article some of the inconsistencies of the Christian religion, and I hav tried to conduct the Christian back to the point where he made his great mistake and became confused, and I hope that he will not feel ungrateful for the service which I hav rendered him. But if he will not hearken to the voice of reason, and prefers darkness rather than light, and lunacy rather than reason, then he must submit to the shackles of ecclesiastical tyranny and continue to manipulate his India rubber God, amen.

JOHN PECK.

Naples, N. Y.

P.S.—After I had finished the foregoing article, as I supposed, my attention was called to a discussion between the Boston Herald and the Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

The Herald, in commenting upon the Wilkesbarre tornado and the late railroad disaster, remarked that the former was a dispensation of providence, while the latter was a result of a careless workman.

The Chronicle replied that the "careless workman might hav been a chosen instrument in carrying out a decree from on high."

Then Guiteau may hav been a "chosen instrument" in carrying out God's decree. That is just what Guiteau claimed. This puts the Boston editor and the Rochester editor on the same level with Guiteau. The God idea makes lunatics of all alike.

The man in Wisconsin who outraged a little girl and used a knife to accomplish his hellish design, and then cut her throat, may hav been another of God's instruments to carry out some unseen benevolent design.

If these men were God's agents, then all who had a hand in hanging them will land in that fiery region where the stoker sleepeth not.

It beats all how, in their heaven-sent catastrophes, God deals out as heavy blows upon those who lisp his praises as he does upon the devil's intimates.

In the destruction of the ancient cities God spared those only who were worthy to escape. If there ever was an act of providence, this must be so construed. Old Mrs. Lot took a forbidden back squint, and got her pay down—spot cash, salt being God's legal tender.

The angelic daughters, the special object of God's care, got their father drunk and he became at once the father and the grandfather of his daughter's children. All the people of the cities of the plains were destroyed, while these abandoned, drunken, incestuous wretches were spared. No doubt a great good, which the world has never been able to see, was accomplished, but who is able to interpret such acts of divine providence?

In the sweep of a tornado kind and tender mothers and innocent children are crushed by falling timbers, while drunken, vicious, gambling wretches are often spared. A vessel goes down with all on board; thirty thousand people perish by an earthquake. Entire cities are buried by a volcano, with young, old, good, bad, and indifferent, and yet these two great editors enter the "fistic ring" to hav a squabble over the unseen ways of providence.

Why, such a God is not worthy to preside over the lowest den in the vilest quarters of the most abandoned city.

Remember, this debate was not between two low-down Christians, but between two great newspaper editors. It must be evident to all that these men would not make such stupid blunders in discussing any other subject.

According to this theory, who knows but the man, whose real name I hav forgotten, but upon whose bloody career the story of Blue Beard was founded, who was known to hav murdered a hundred and forty children, was an instrument in the hand of God for some unseen purpose?

Right on the heel of this Wilkesbarre providential tornado, another providential ghost appears. The Thousand Island Park House was discovered to be on fire by a lot of young fellows playing cards. They gave the timely alarm or all would hav perished.

When lotteries and wheels of fortune and dice and race-horses and all manner of gambling devices become instruments in the hands of God, ho, Liberal, giv us your hand, let us all take a turn.

Is it not evident that all who believe in God as the supreme ruler of the universe are turned into crazy cranks? From the great Gladstone down through the Rev. Herbert W. Morris, A.M., and the newspaper editors, to the lowest Catholic in the ditch, they show themselvs to be lunatics whenever they broach the God idea.

Is it not about time that this great embodiment of nothingness, which dwells nowhere and does nothing, was retired, and all of this fool talk about providential dispensation "stamped out?" Has not the God idea had its day and produced its crop of idiots and lunatics? Should not every Liberal carry a sling and throw one stone at least at this Goliath of Christian superstition? J. P.

More About Robert Burns.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 20th, you hav an article—taken from the Agnostic Journal—by Robert A. Riddell, upon the question, "Robert Burns, Was He a Christian?"

The writer thinks not, and givs some pretty good evidence for so believing. It would seem that a little additional evidence might be found in some of Burns's prose writings themselvs. Let us see.

Whatever mitigates the woes, or increases the happiness of others, this is my criterion of goodness; and whatever injures society at large, or any individual in it, this is my measure of iniquity (From Letter 194, June 21, 1789).

This is hardly "the language of Cainan," but sounds rather Ingersollian and abreast of modern Freethought. Again:

Mankind are by nature benevolent creatures, except in a few scoundrelly instances. I do not think that avarice of the good things we chance to hav is born with us; but we are placed here amid so much nakedness, and hunger, and poverty, and want, that we are under a cursed necessity in studying selfishness in order that we may EXIST Still, there are in every age a few souls that all the wants and woes of life cannot debase to selfishness or even to the necessary alloy of caution and prudence. If ever I am in danger of vanity, it is when I contemplate myself on this side of my disposition and character. I am no saint. I hav a whole host of follies and sins to answer for; but if I could —and I believe I do it as far as I can—I would wipe all tears from all eyes (Letter 215, March 3, 1790).

That written in the light of Christian theology? Not much! But farther:

All my fears and cares are of this world; if there is another, an honest man has nothing to fear from it. I hate a man that wishes to be a deist; but I fear every fair, unprejudiced inquirer must, in some degree, be a skeptic. It is not that there are any very staggering arguments against the immortality of man; but, like electricity, phlogiston, etc., the subject is so involved in darkness that we want data to go upon.

One thing frightens me much. That we are to liv forever seems too good to be true! That we are to enter into new scenes of existence, where, exempt from want and pain, we shall enjoy ourselvs and our friends without satiety or separation, how much should I be indebted to anyone who could fully assure me that this was certain! (Letter 214, Feb. 16, 1790).

Small amount in this of "reading one's title clear to mansions in the skies"—sure. Once more:

I now began to be known in the neighborhood as a maker of rhymes. The first of my poetic offspring that saw the light, was a burlesque lamentation on a quarrel between two reverend Calvinists; both of them dramatis personæ in my Holy Fair. I had a notion myself that the piece had some merit; but to prevent the worst, I gave a copy of it to a friend, who was very fond of such things, and told him I could not guess who was the author of it, but that I thought it pretty clever. With a certain description of the clergy, as well as laity, it met with a roar of applause. Holy Willie's Prayer made its next appearance and alarmed the Kirk-session so much, that they held several meetings to look over their spiritual artillery, if happily any of it might be pointed against profane rhymers (From Burns's Autobiography).

A SUBSCRIBER.

Puritanism and Slavery.

Slavery in New England has never been a subject of discussion to which the modern New Englander has given a cordial welcome. When he has discussed it with any reasonableness at all, his proud self-satisfaction has found an easy refuge in the fact that while New England did hav slaves she had the moral courage to rid herself of the inhuman institution. Much virtue has been assumed for the contrast thus offered to states in the South. The facts which Mr. Weeden, in his "History of New England," brings out will scarcely afford satisfaction to this pharisaical condition of the New England mind. He never minces matters for New England's sake. He tells us the whole truth as he has found it, and this does not leave professions of moral motivs in the matter very stable legs to stand on. With his usual remorselessness in the presentation of facts, he shows that moral considerations did not enter into the case at all. It was purely economic in its beginning, its growth, and its end, and almost the sole voice in early colonial times that raised itself in behalf of a larger humanity was the voice of Judge Sewall.

Mr. Weeden begins his account of New England slavery with a frank statement that it was New England's good fortune to hav a climate too harsh and a social system too simple to engender a good economic employment of black labor. The land's simple industrial methods "placed a natural barrier against an alien social system," while the blacks soon dwindled in numbers or dropped out from "a life too severe for any but the hardiest and firmest-fibered races." In all this there was no moral aversion to slavery as an inhuman institution. Even the Winthrops and other Puritans "asked and received Indian captivs for slaves as freely as any partisan for loot or plunder," while the righteous Cotton Mather himself "employed his black servant, showing as little regard for the rights of man as the Boston merchant or Narragansett planter." That slavery remained a small factor in New England growth was due to no awakening of conscience, but to economic laws which "forbade its growth."

There is no lack of proof that the slave trade in New England began at an early period, and prevailed generally down to the Revolution. It was immensely forwarded bv New England rum, which, after 1723, displaced French brandies on that thirsty Gold Coast which eagerly accepted it in exchange for its own children. Having enslaved Indians wherever they could, the New England settlers had no scruples about enslaving the negro after buying him with rum. George Downing, a nephew of Winthrop and a minister of the gospel, wrote to Winthrop from the West Indies: "If you go to Barbadoes, you will see a flourishing island, many able men. I believe they hav bought this year no less than a thousand negroes, and the more they buy the better able they are to buy, for in a year and a half they will earn (with God's blessing) as much as they cost." No voice of conscience stepped in to help the New Englander withstand the temptation here placed before him. He could see nothing wrong in exchanging rum for negroes, and then making the negroes his slaves. Governor Hopkins is cited as authority for the statement that Rhode Island, for more than thirty years before 1764, had sent to the Gold Coast every year eighteen vessels laden with eighteen hundred hogsheads of rum, while the vile commerce afforded £40,000 every year for remittance from that colony to England. Mr. Weeden says the forefathers tried other goods than rum, but found they had slow sale on the Coast. One trader is recorded as having said he "repented a hundred times ye buying of these dry goods," since rum would hav served him so much better in making exchange for blacks.

Mr. Weeden calmly says the New England forefathers are not to be "charged with any special preference for that civilizing instrument over all the other resources of the two continents." Their instincts "were neither moral nor immoral; they were simply economic." There existed in those times a certain respected and prosperous elder of the church who had uniform success in slave-trading. He always returned thanks on the Sunday after a slaver arrived at Newport, that "an overruling providence had been pleased to bring to this land of freedom another cargo of benighted heathens to enjoy the blessing of a gospel dispensation." Even Peter Faneuil, the rich and energetic merchant who gave Boston her Faneuil Hall, that prospectiv cradle of liberty, deliberately planned a venture aimed at African negroes, and he owned one-half of it himself. But he did not liv to see the ship with its cargo of twenty negroes sail back into Newport harbor one fine morning in April, 1743, after the ship's captain had been "murdered on the Coast by the nativs whom he was persuading to accept 'the blessing of a gospel dispensation.'" On arrival the vessel and cargo of slaves had to be sold. Peter Faneuil's brother appeared and received his due share of the proceeds as Peter's administrator and heir. For these twenty negroes £1,644 in all were obtained, and among the purchasers were men with names now honorable in New England annals.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

The Freethinkers of Germany hav met with a serious misfortune in the decease of Staff Physician Dr. Heinrich Oldtmann. The doctor was one of those rare individuals who deem moral honesty and courage of greater value than the almighty dollar.—Das Menschenthum.

In Sweden there are employed by the state church 2,264 ministers, who receive in salaries 6,000,000 crowns. If we add archdeacons and bishops the yearly budget of the church is about 7,570,000 crowns, but besides this the church possesses property (not taxed, of course) to a taxation value of 58,720,995 crowns. The number of children attending Sunday-school is 24,000. Certainly there is need of Freethought and Freethinkers in Sweden.

It is all right to teach modern science in a university, but when one livs in Austria, and does not know any better than to giv popular scientific lectures on "The Truth of Nature as a Means to the Development of Humanity" and on "God, His Deeds and Writings Scientifically Considered," then one deserves to share the fate dealt out to the seventy-year-old professor, Dr. Bruhl, who has been indicted for blasphemy contained in the above-named lectures.—De Dageraad.

Somebody is always annoying his holiness in the Vatican. First Freethinkers placed a statue of Bruno in front of his windows, and now the municipality of Florence, Italy, has decided to turn the Santa Croce church into a pantheon, and a beginning has been made by placing a marble tablet bearing the name of the Freethinker Garibaldi and commemorating his deeds. These Freethinkers never care whether or not they hurt the feelings of an infallible Christian.—Nieuws van den Dag.

The clergy and the students of theology in Sweden hav not yet comprehended what danger there is in engaging in a public debate with an educated Freethinker. Every now and then we read in Fritänkaren of a "would-be" debate, and of course the result is always the same—a defeat of the defender of Mr. Jehovah. While Mr. Lennstrand is lecturing, debating, and organizing in east and central Sweden, Mr. Berghell is doing good work in Skaane and Blekinge, where, especially in the city of Malmö, he is supported by the Liberal Unitarian Society there, under the leadership of Mr. Axel Danielson.

According to the law of Oct. 30, 1886, lay brothers as well as members of religious orders are forbidden to teach in the public schools of France. The clerical party in the French chamber succeeded in adding an amendment to the bill providing that the discharge of clerical teachers should not be sudden; accordingly a provision adding a period of five years before the final expulsion of the clergy was agreed upon. It is interesting to note that already in the third division of the public schools, the elementary schools, to children between nine and ten years of age branches like ethics and "duties of a citizen" are taught. In the schools which hav dispensed with the service of clericals the average standard of knowledge of the children is greater than in those managed by the clergy.

Two new instances of bigotry exhibited by German authorities, evidently to please "der kaiser," hav come to our notice. In Freireligiöses-Sonntags-Blatt, Dr. Voelkel informs the readers of his journal that he was invited by the Free Religious Society of Erfurt to inaugurate the Sunday-school meeting. Everything was in order, when at the eleventh hour F. Brandt, the president of the society, was notified that he was liable to a fine of $50 or four days' imprisonment if the meeting took place. Complaints against the mayor for unlawful proceedings were immediately made to the chief authority, and the government. The other instance of official bigotry was at Nienburg. Here the mayor had given a permit to deliver a lecture, when he suddenly, and only a few hours before the beginning of the lecture, recalled his permission, owing to instruction received by him from his superior. Who this latter bigot was we do not know—a fact much to be regretted, for the name of every Christian who uses his official power to persecute Freethinkers ought to be held up to public scorn.

The American Secular Union Congress.

In regard to railroad fares to the Portsmouth Congress we would ask our friends to note specially what we giv below.

We called attention last week to the fact that Mr. A. M. Freeman, of Chicago, had succeeded in obtaining a round trip ticket from that city for the Portsmouth Congress for $14 75. We understand that he has now succeeded in obtaining a slight further reduction; and we would recommend all our Chicago friends, whether delegates or otherwise, to apply to Mr. A. M. Freeman, 402 West Madison street, Chicago, Ill., before purchasing their tickets.

As mentioned last week, the Eastern, Central, and Southern lines (the Western Passenger Association has declined to enter the pool) will grant us a reduction of two-thirds the regular first-class fare on our homeward tickets, provided we comply with the following conditions:

1. Each person desiring the reduction must purchase a first-class ticket to Portsmouth, O., for which he will pay the regular fare; and upon request, the ticket agent will, at the time he buys the ticket, giv him a printed certificate of purchase, properly filled out and signed by said ticket agent.

2. If through tickets cannot be procured at the starting-point, the traveler must purchase to the most convenient point where through tickets can be obtained, and repurchase through to Portsmouth, requesting a certificate from the ticket agent at the point where repurchase is made.

3. Tickets for the return journey will be sold, by the ticket agent at Portsmouth, O., at one-third the highest limited fare, only to those holding certificates (referred to above) signed by the ticket agent at the point where through ticket to Portsmouth was purchased, and countersigned by Ida C. Craddock, secretary of the American Secular Union, certifying that the holder has been in regular attendance at the Portsmouth Congress.

4. It is absolutely necessary that such a certificate be procured by each traveler, as it proves that full fare has been paid for the journey to Portsmouth, and that the purchaser is therefore entitled to the excursion fare returning. It will also determin the route via which the ticket for the return journey should be issued.

5. On some of the roads, tickets for return journey will be furnished only on certificates procured not more than three days before the meeting assembles, nor later than three days after the commencement of the meeting, and will be available for continuous passage only; no stop-over privileges being allowed on tickets sold at less than full fares. Certificates will not be honored unless presented within three days after the date of the adjournment of the Congress.

6. Ticket agents will be instructed that the excursion fares will not be available unless the holders of certificates are properly identified, as above described, by Ida C. Craddock, secretary of the American Secular Union, on the certificate.

7. These certificates are not transferable.

8. The reduction on return journey will apply only to the point at which a traveler's through ticket was purchased to Portsmouth on his way to the Congress.

9. (Very important.) NO REFUND OF FARE WILL BE MADE ON ANY ACCOUNT WHATEVER BECAUSE OF FAILURE ON YOUR PART TO OBTAIN A CERTIFICATE. Should you neglect to obtain a certificate as the above conditions provide, you will be obliged to pay full fare both ways.

10. Last, but not least, it is recommended that those who wish to obtain certificates shall arrange to be at the ticket office a half-hour before trains start, in order to receive proper attention from the ticket agent.

From Philadelphia, the Chesapeake and Ohio railroad (saving Broad street station) giv us a rate of $15 50 first-class fare to Portsmouth, and one-third returning, which will bring the amount of round-trip ticket within $21. From New York city, the fare will be $16 going to Portsmouth, and one-third returning; and those of our friends who start from New York are requested to call at the office of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Co., 362 Broadway, to procure tickets.

Our friends will please bear in mind that, in order to secure the above reductions in fare, they must be certain to provide themselvs with duly signed and countersigned certificates, as given above. No stop-over tickets will be allowed for Philadelphia or other intermediate points. Friends desiring to remain over in Philadelphia, either going or returning, will hav to pay regular fare between New York and Philadelphia, and repurchase ticket on which reduction is to be allowed in Philadelphia.

A vestibule train leaves New York via Pennsylvania railroad at 5 P M; Philadelphia, 7:40 P.M; Baltimore, 9.55 P M; Washington, 11:10 P M., and reaches Portsmouth at 2 30 P M. next day. Friends may either carry their own lunches, or procure meals in the dining-car at $1 per meal. This is the only train carrying a dining-car through between New York and Portsmouth without change. The entire train is heated with steam, and is lighted with electric lights, individual electric lamps being provided for any passenger who may desire one at his seat or in his birth. The road winds through some of the most picturesque scenery to be had anywhere among the Alleghanies. At 6:45 next morning, we arrive at White Sulphur Springs, that famous aristocratic resort of the "F. F. V.'s" (first families of Virginia), situated in an undulating valley surrounded by mountains. The medicinal virtues of these springs are world-renowned, and hav been known and tested since 1788. Further on, we come into the Greenbrier valley, where the picturesque stream which givs the valley its name flows tranquilly along over a bed of slate. At Kanawha Falls, which we reach about 10:30, the scenery is wild and rugged in the extreme. "The broad river," writes an eastbound traveler, "sweeps majestically down over the rocks, and on both sides of you tower verdure-clad walls that are broken here and there with frowning masses of rock. Past the Hawks' Nest, or under it, the train rushes, carrying you into the wild, rugged defiles made by the New river, as it cuts its narrow pathway through the solid rock. There is no wilder or more picturesque scenery in America than that along the banks of the little stream which goes roaring and plunging over its stony course many feet below you." Later on we enter the beautiful valley of the Ohio, with its alternating fertil farms and busy manufacturing towns, and at 2:30 in the afternoon we find ourselvs at Portsmouth.

While it would of course be desirable, as a matter of social pleasure, that all our friends journey to Portsmouth on the same train, it is not at all obligatory. They can go individually on whatever train suits them best, and still be entitled to the reduction, provided they comply with the conditions regarding certificates, given above. Coming home, it is hoped that as many as possible will return on the one train, so that we may hav a fraternal jubilation and a good time generally—as well as more leisure than is likely to obtain at the Congress for overflow discussions of ways and means of extending our work.

We trust that our friends everywhere, and especially to the north and east of Philadelphia, can manage to come this way, so that we can hav a pleasant social journey homeward.

In response to an invitation which we extended to the editors of the American Sentinel and to the officers of the National Religious Liberty Association, we are happy to announce that we may expect to hav the pleasure of an address from Prof. J. O. Corliss, corresponding secretary of the latter. We need not remind our friends how persistently the above organizations are protesting against Sunday laws, and, in fact, against the whole scheme of the National Reform party. It is true that the American Sentinel and the National Religious Liberty Association are swayed by different motivs from ourselvs. They observe Saturday as a Sabbath, although they would not enforce its observance upon others. Their impelling motiv is to uphold their Christian doctrins, while ours is to uphold the principles of Freethought. But, in the matter of total separation of church and state, we stand shoulder to shoulder. Why should we not, therefore, join forces? Our constitution provides for the admission of societies auxiliary to the American Secular Union, where they pledge themselvs to uphold the Nine Demands and to coöperate with us; and it leaves them perfectly free otherwise.

Whether the National Religious Liberty Association will see its way clear to becoming such an auxiliary to the American Secular Union, remains to be seen. At all events, we bespeak for Professor Corliss and for what he has to say to us a cordial welcome from all true Liberals. In union is strength. And, since his association and ours are working toward the same end—religious liberty—it does seem as though we ought to help each other, however our respectiv isms may differ.

IDA C. CRADDOCK, Corr. Sec. A. S. U.
Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 13, 1890.

The Convention of the American Secular Union.

Having for more than fifty years been a believer in the principles of the American Secular Union, and an humble worker in the ranks of Freethought, I am constrained to write a few lines to induce all those who claim to be Liberals in matters pertaining to religious opinions to unite in helping the president, secretary, and directors of the Union to make the coming convention at Portsmouth, O., a success beyond any previously held.

Is there any good legitimate reason why all those holding the many different views of Liberal Freethought should not unite in efforts to prevent the practical union of church and state that all those holding the great variety of Christian creeds are unitedly striving to accomplish? If those Christians who are so wide apart in opinions, about which they hav differed and quarreled so much and so long, can unite on the main question, why will not those who profess to be more consistent and liberal in their views, do the same, and do it with an energy and hearty good will that will tell, and prevent what may prove in the near future a calamity to our nation and the world?

Why stand we here idle? Why are so many apparently indifferent in this matter, that they seem to think of vital importance? Why remain inactiv till our chains are forged and riveted?

Turn to the history of the past and see what religious fanaticism has done, and from the efforts now being made, learn what the future may hav in store. "History repeats itself," is a maxim that it is well to remember in this as well as many other things. What humanity has suffered in the past on account of opinions held pertaining to religious belief, should induce those who believe in perfect freedom and equality before the law, to be up and doing to make secure and permanent the right of each and all to hold and express without fear or favor such opinions in regard to matters pertaining to creation, deity, immortality, a future life, its rewards, punishments, etc., as each individual may think most reasonable, truthful, and best for his or her enjoyment both here and hereafter. Providing always, that such opinions, held and expressed, do not tend to make those holding them law-breakers and bad citizens generally, and cause them to deny to others legitimate rights that they claim for themselvs.

For these as well as many other reasons too numerous to mention here and now, let all Freethinkers, although they may differ radically on many points, respond liberally to the grand appeal for union and material aid, recently made by Miss Ida C. Craddock, secretary of the Secular Union, so that the convention at Portsmouth, O., may be a great success as to numbers attending, and also the influence it will exert in promoting the cause of independent Freethought and cementing in bonds of fraternal brotherhood, not only all Freethinkers, but all mankind, to the end that good words and works may predominate and all our people be willing to concede to others the right to hold opinions and beliefs of a different nature on all matters of a political, social, and religious nature, and be respected and protected therein, so long as those opinions do not counsel, advise, or hav a tendency to lead to acts contrary to law and good order in society. Always conceding the right of everyone on all matters of difference to appeal to the people generally, and our law-makers especially, for redress of grievances in all legal and legitimate ways. CONVERSE CLOSE.

Grattan, Mich., Oct. 8, 1890.

Campaigning in Washington.

I was at Nooksack City, Whatcom county, September 6th, 7th, and 8th. The question is frequently asked, "Why are there so many more Liberals West than in the East?" First, because the people who sell out and come West leave old associations, climb out of their old ruts and evolute out of fogyism, come prepared for new scenes, new associations, and are willing to adopt new ideas, new methods, and soon fall into line and keep step with the onward march of Liberalism and progress. Secondly, because the ambition and effort to make the place of their new home grow and prosper expands their views, enlarges alike their hearts and intellect. Their daily lives are filled with hope, energy, ambition; success affords them confidence; they find happiness in aiding, helping each other. They think for themselvs, cast off old fables, fears, and faiths, become sturdily independent and acquire the courage of their convictions.

There are so many things which make life worth living here which are wanting in the East. Eager, hustling, energetic people come together; strangers take each other on trust, all willing to help each other, for all hav a common bond of union in the ardent desire to see their town rival the biggest city of the state. Everything has to be started from the ground up—streets opened, bridges built, schools established. All the framework of modern society, with its marvelous inventions for comfort and convenience, must be set up, and in this work there is well-paid labor for all, and a wide opening for public spirit, push, enterprise, and speculation. Everyone is exceedingly busy and exceedingly happy, because exceedingly hopeful. The erection of each new building, every new store, manufactory, or enterprise, is a personal matter of interest and rejoicing. The embryo city in the midst of immense forest to-day all believe is destined to be a great metropolis, and their wishes and will power giv fruition to their hopes. The forests are cleared and converted into ranches, farms, and orchards. City lots are in demand. The live, wide-awake newspaper, water works, sewage, electric lights and electric street-cars, school-houses, opera house, and literary society are successfully started, and all being interested help to secure their success. This ambition this spirit of hustling, so characteristic of the West, is very contagious. The "tenderfoot" is, if of any account, sure to catch the spirit of energy and progress.

Only a few months ago, when I visited Roeder for the first time, I was told there was a town site located in the woods about three miles from there It was on a plateau six feet above the level of the surrounding rivers, lying between the Nooksack and Sumas, and they had named the place Nooksack City. It was in the midst of virgin forest. To people of the East the wild woods, with gigantic trees six to twenty feet in diameter, towering from three to four hundred feet high, with dense undergrowth and blown-down trees piled in places six to ten feet deep —the transformation of this in a few short months into a thriving, bustling town, with graded avenues, $1 200 hotel, stores, school-houses, halls, etc., seems incredible; yet all over this Puget sound country these magical transformations are taking place. Nooksack City is only one instance. Already it has secured admirable railroad facilities. That representativ young Western hustler and sound Liberal, Joseph E. Leader, writes me: "Our new railroad depot is now well under way. Street grading has again started. Two more large, very handsome residences and another church are begun. The rails are being laid on the track; everything is hustling and lively."

I delivered three lectures at Nooksack City at the cost and responsibility of Jos. E. Leader. I found there was quite a Liberal element. D. E. Rice, of Roeder, ever ready to help in every good work, brought a jolly big load of genuin Liberals from Roeder, who gave zest and interest to the occasion. The following extract from a letter of Mr. Jos. E. Leader is the best testimony of the results of the lectures: "I hear that the Presbyterians are starting preparations for a revival meeting to counteract the effects of the wave of Infidelity that is sweeping over the place. They hope by this means to counteract the influence of your lectures, and the Liberal literature you distributed. I am satisfied that we will be able to organize with a membership of over ten of our very best citizens by the next time you come."

Here are splendid opportunities for settlers. The country surrounding Nooksack City—in fact, nearly the whole of Whatcom county—is unsurpassed for farming, the average yield per acre being: hops, 2 500 pounds; barley, 100 bushels; wheat, 35 bushels; potatoes, 400 bushels; mangel wurzels, 40 tons; rutabagoes, 50 tons. Failure of fruit crops in Whatcom county has never yet occurred. The bottom lands provide abundance of richest pasture, and milk is in demand in the trinity cities at ten cents per quart.

I was at Whatcom September 12th, 13th, and 14th, the oldest of the three cities of Bellingham bay. Sehome and Whatcom hav grown together, and dwellings are reaching out and extending clear to Fairhaven. All three will be one; only the question of a name delays the union. Boomed additions are always to be closely examined, for even in Washington there are bad spots. It does not do to take all advertisments at par, as will be seen from the following extract from the Whatcom Reveille:

The indiscriminate platting of any land in the county that will make a good showing on a map is injurious to a county. There is an addition to Whatcom that is a howling swamp. There is one to Fairhaven on Lake Samish that is an echoing rock pile. A house would hav to be chained to the side of the mountain to be situated on one addition. A man might fall from the topmost lot and drop into the water, a quarter of a mile below. The birds play hide-and-seek in the clouds that cling to the streets. In the Whatcom swamp the screams of the panther and the hoot of the owl make ceaseless music. The exhalations rise from its boulevards and streets whenever the sun shines. To look at the property is to wet your feet. To liv on it is to put on the white robes of immortality. To buy lots in either addition is to lose faith in humanity, and to question the goodness of providence.

Politics, union of the cities bonding to build roads, cities, etc., distract attention from Liberal work, yet in each of the three cities there are large numbers of Liberals. Once they could be aroused from their apathy, and realize the need of practical organization, a live and powerful local Secular Union could be established.

Under that able, life-long Liberal and successful promoter of the interests of Whatcom, John T. Collins, I delivered three lectures at the Opera House to good attendance and interest, and hav the assurance of Friend Collins and his good partner, Wm. Powell, that they will speedily garner in a goodly number of Liberals as members of the Washington Secular Union, and "Collins and Powell" are a firm known all over the sound country as never failing of success in any enterprise they undertake.

I enjoyed my visit very much; the kindness and hospitality of the friends at Whatcom cannot be surpassed, and I am eager for the delight of again visiting them.

Rabbi Friedlander.

No wonder that the public feeling, from Dan even unto Beersheba, has been shocked at the Brooklyn phenomenon—the persecution of Jews by Jews! We would hav thought that nearly eighteen hundred years of cruelty, practiced by the Christians upon the Jews, on account of their religion, so severe and so long continued as to change their national character from an agricultural to a mercantil, or money-making one, would hav rooted out all desire to punish any man for his religious opinions. But in the Brooklyn case we hav a new and glaring proof that the disposition of religion to persecute is as inherent and ineradicable as the liking for blood is in the nature of a tiger. The intense feeling of brotherhood among the Jews has always been one of their chief and beautiful characteristics. Even the love between the sexes of the human family has not been strong enough, except in a very few instances, to overcome the exclusiv partiality of the Jews for their own Abrahamitic blood, and their refusal to marry among the gentiles. But the sentiment of religion which the whole human race has inherited from ancestors who lived millions of years ago, when their ignorance of natural phenomena was nearly as total as that of their brutal congeners; and when the mean feeling of fear, resulting from ignorance, was wrought into the warp and woof of their character by the force of countless thousands of years—I say this sentiment in the case of Rabbi Friedlander and his backers has proved itself to be stronger than the attachments of blood and race. The rabbi, no doubt, is by nature an amiable man, but his religion has transformed him into a persecutor, and that of his own brethren. His interpolation of words into the document he undertook to interpret for the public, was a case of clear forgery and counterfeiting, seemingly to exasperate the people, and to get up a panic which was likely to end in murder. A Methodist minister, Rev. Mr. De Ford, was recently arrested and sent to jail in Milwaukee for altering a bank bill from a low to a higher denomination. The robbery contemplated by passing it upon ignorant people amounted to only ten or twenty dollars, but his punishment, if convicted, will be a term of some years' imprisonment in the penitentiary with hard labor. Yet here are criminal interpolations in an important document by Rabbi Friedlander, which injure his fellow-men a thousand times more than the Methodist did by his form of forgery and counterfeiting. What could prompt him to commit such crime and outrage? It was his religion, not his lack of religion. It overrode all his fine instincts of justice, honor, and mercy, and made him an unscrupulous knave and persecutor. If he had exercised his talent for interpolation upon a five-dollar bill, he would hav to accompany his Christian brother, DeFord, to prison, as too dangerous a character to be turned loose upon society again. But he will probably not go to prison, and perhaps not blush at his conduct; for thousands of the clergy would do as he did, and feel that they were doing God's service.

Now, Mr. Editor, my object in this note is to ask the attention of your readers to this new Brooklyn proof and illustration of the fact that, essentially, though not in form, the sentiment called religion is the same yesterday, to day, and forever among all nations and races of people; and that the human race as a whole never will be civilized until this deadly element is completely eliminated from its character, and men are taught to govern themselvs by the code of natural morals, which never changes its complexion to suit the changing times and opinions. How pitiable, then, is it to see so many people who repudiate the dogmas and spirit of the orthodox church, running after the Jack-o-lanterns of the day in search of a religion that will not persecute; that is to say, the "real," "pure," "genuin" fire that always keeps cool, and will never burn.

The Schweitzer Tomato.

George Macdonald in San Francisco Freethought.

"Listen, and I will relate to you my life's history, and the horrible tale of it, for it is very, very horrible. You observe that I stand while speaking. When you hav heard my story you will not wonder that I do not sit. I see that you hav recognized me. I am Podsnap.

"I am the son of a wealthy maiden lady. I was born young. When I think of my extreme youth at that time and of my indiscretions I realize the truth of the words spoken nineteen hundred years ago, 'He that is born of woman has experienced his first misfortune.' You do not see the bearing of these details. Neither do I.

"I lived a bachelor life till the age of thirty. I believed myself moral, but I was not. I played fifteen-ball pool for the drinks, for which my wealth enabled me to pay when I was stuck. Once I sat in a game of penny ante, and lost forty-five cents."

The speaker paused, overcome by emotion, but recovering himself, resumed in a harsh, hollow voice:

"From the window of my room I could look out upon the backyard containing clotheslines. One day I saw a woman hanging out her wash. She had clothespins between her teeth, and used them to fasten a pair of striped stockings to the line. I was caught by a pair of striped stockings. The wind inflated the stockings, and I was insane. I was as a New England poet in the presence of pie. I married the woman and saw the stockings when she had them on. They were not as full as when inflated by the wind. Young man, marriage is a disappointment and a sham. All married men know this, but will not confess it.

"The honeymoon was a cheat. The nights were too short. After we were married my wife did no more washing; I told her that work was necessary to her health, but she shuffled and evaded the question by pleading that she was quite robust. When I insisted she wiped the floor with me. Ah, the horrible sensation! The idea that work is necessary to muscular development is a lie.

"We had children—that is, my wife did. You may hav children; if not, your wife may hav. The children were a source of contention, because each of us insisted that the other was responsible for them. But I know that except for her I should hav been childless.

"We quarreled and one day I struck her. She did not scream. She looked at me a moment, and then picked up a tomato and hit me with it in the eye. Young man, never lift your hand to woman save in self-defense. Since then I hav hated tomatoes.

"There was a Dutch grocer on the corner, and he kept my wife supplied with the fruit. Yesterday I saw him carrying a bundle into the house. I knew it contained tomatoes, and I followed him, filled with a devouring jealousy. Quietly I crept up the stairs with a club in my hand. It was a desperate thing to do, but I was a desperate man. Softly I opened the door, and confronted them. They were eating tomatoes from the paper bag which lay upon the table. Upon seeing me they continued to eat. Keeping the club concealed behind me, I advanced toward the table, when, suddenly producing my weapon, I struck the bag a blow which scattered its contents to the four winds. What excess will a man not commit under the promptings of the passions!

"How can I describe what followed. That wretch, the Dutch grocer, arose from his seat, grasped me by the shoulders, turned me suddenly about, and kicked me not only out of the room, but down the stairs and far into the street.

"That is why I am standing as I relate to you my very horrible story."

[Period of two years elapses, and the narrator resumes:]

"My wife is now tending store for the Dutch grocer, having obtained a divorce from me on account of incompatibility of temperament. There was no union of being between us. I shall shortly marry again. Marriage is a humbug, but the unmarried state is worse than the first.

"I hold it true whate'er befall—
I felt it when the grocer kicked—
'Tis better to be loved and licked
Than never to be loved at all."

Lectures and Meetings.

H. O. PENTECOST lectures every Sunday evening at Grand Opera House, Eighth avenue and Twenty-third street, at 8 P.M. Entrance on Twenty-third street.

THE lecture at the Manhattan Liberal Club, 220 East Fifteenth street, this week, Friday evening, is by A. L. Rawson on "Symbolical Language in Religion and Art."

THE Brooklyn Philosophical Association (Bedford avenue and South Second street, E. D.) will hear Mr. Henry Rowley discourse on "Jesus, Mill, and Spencer," on Sunday, October 19th, at 3 P.M.

J. E. REMSBURG has been lecturing to the Mormons. He spoke at Ogden, Utah, September 28th; Almy, Wyo., September 29th; Coalville, Utah, September 30th and October 1st; Kamas, Utah, October 2d and 3d; Logan, Utah, October 4th.

ON Sunday, November 9th, Charles Watts will lecture for Friendship Liberal League, Philadelphia. Hall Eighth and Vine streets. Entrance on Eighth street. Subject, 2:30 P.M., "Labor and Capital from a Secular Standpoint." Subject, 7:30 P.M., "Mind and Matter: Whence Comes Intelligence?" All are welcome.

MR. S. P. PUTNAM proposes to invade Texas during December and January on a lecturing tour. He has engagements at Fort Worth, Burnet, Big Springs, Goldthwait, Flatonia, Forney, Sherman, and Trenton. Liberals in other places desiring to hear him should write him at once at 838 Howard street, San Francisco, Cal.

W. F. JAMIESON writes: "It is with regret that I find myself obliged to forego the anticipated pleasure of attending the Secular Congress at Portsmouth, O. My home in Colorado is threatened, in our absence, by the money-lender. My best efforts will be required to save it; and I hope that I can still devote my time to lecture work."

The Idealist's Idea of Man.

If a man die shall he liv again? All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my change come. . . . There is hope of a tree if it be cut down, that it will sprout again and that the tender branch thereof will not cease: though the root thereof wax old in the earth and the stock thereof die in the ground; yet through the scent of water it will bud and bring forth boughs like a plant: But man dieth and wasteth away; yea, he giveth up the ghost and where is he? . . . As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away, so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more. . . . They are destroyed from morning to evening; they perish forever without any regarding it.—Selected from the book of Job.

Yes, what is man and what constitutes his identity? Surely this is not a material condition, for our senses do not take cognizance of matter. These only apprise us of phenomena, and we must therefore consider matter a hypothetical entity. A hypothetical entity is necessarily a practical one. We derive from the earth, the air, and the sea the particles that compose our bodies. These hav resided in countless other organisms of which they hav at some time formed a part, and had those individuals not died we could not hav been born. This consideration proves that though matter is immortal, there can be no resurrection of the body and no physical immortality for the individual, but that matter pursues its circuit through the three kingdoms in forms of ever-changing identity which experience pain, pleasure, and oblivion. In some cases an immaterial entity produces the same effect as a material one, as when one magnet acts upon another magnetic body with a force proportional to its strength, and inversely proportional to the square of its distance, irrespectiv of any surrounding or intervening non-magnetic substance, or of a vacuum. In this instance an immaterial agency, acting through a solid substance, draws two bodies toward each other, precisely as that material agency, a piece of rubber, might do if it were passed through the substance intervening and attached to both. Yet this force is not perceptible to our senses, and did we not observe its effects we would deny its existence. As one magnet may act upon another, or the electric current flowing through one circuit may produce currents in a neighboring wire by induction, so may one mind influence another one. This power is known under many aliases, but it may be defined as the influence that one mind may exert on a less positiv one by a mental effort. This science seems the basis of Spiritualism, and if it be so the latter is probably false. It may be that in many cases the medium is able to mesmerize his subjects by an effort of the will, and to place their minds in such harmony with his own that he can direct them, but this gives us no assurance of immortality. Magnetism is produced by a magnet, electricity proceeds from a generator, and thought is a manifestation of the brain. All phenomena are dependent on material conditions, and so far as we know no phenomenon can survive indefinitly the dissolution of the condition that produces it. Man viewed from a Materialistic standpoint is like a stream which is supplied by a spring and absorbed in the ground—he returns to the earth and his thoughts perish. Hav we evidence of a future state of existence? I think so—that is possible which is not disproved. I conjecture that an infinit number of conditions are imperceptible to our senses, for these only apprise us of such phenomena as contribute to our safety or facilitate our convenience. There is no light to the subterranean fish that hav lost their eyes, nor is there color to the blind. There is no sound to the deaf, no love to the New Yorkers, no beauty to the vile, no sensation to a stone. We are wholly dependent on the agency of our senses for our ideas of nature, and if each of these can deceive us severally, they all may do so collectivly, and we therefore cannot be really certain of anything. Again, I hav dreamed of dreaming that I had dreamed, and my dreams hav been terminated sometimes by contingencies that would hav caused my death had they been realities, yet they seemed as real to me as the perceptions of my wakeful hours, and when I could liv no longer in dreamland I awoke. I believe that the mind is an entity which creates its environment in accordance with external impressions and physiological influences, but I cannot know positivly whether I am living in this world or dreaming in some other one. No physiological explanation can hav any bearing on this question, for it too may be dreamed of. Moreover, a hallucination is to the mind that conceives it a fact to the extent it is accepted, and an error in the degree that it is discredited. How, then, can the individual determin the extent of his sanity, or be positiv of the validity of his impressions? No physical explanation is admissible, for it, too, may be imagined. Inertia is a universal property of matter and a condition peculiar to all bodies, therefore, they cannot move themselvs nor can they stop themselvs if they be put in motion. If a body cannot move itself nor stop itself, and we define force as that power which does both, which moves matter and is not manifested otherwise, then force must be something external to matter, but inseparable from it nevertheless, and this view is confirmed by the immortality of both, and the conservations of substance and energy. The soul cannot be force nor matter, nor is voluntary motion an evidence of its existence, for this is consistent with an automaton. I may fill the fire-box of a locomotiv with combustible substances, place amongst them the chemicals that sooner or later will ignite spontaneously, open the throttle, and go my way. I leave the engin in a condition described as "dead." Presently, a spontaneous combustion occurs in the fire-box, the water becomes heated, steam arises, the pressure increases, and the engin moves—from its own volition, by virtue of the energy of the fuel that is consumed in the fire-box. If the fuel is not replenished, the locomotiv may be said to stop shortly from starvation, but it may be regulated and supplied with coal and water automatically without reducing its speed, and it may then continue in motion without human intervention until some part of it is outworn.

As it takes its course in accordance with the causation of the inevitable laws of nature, the same as a man does, it may destroy life that gets in its way by accident or otherwise; as did William Kemmler, the poor wretch who was burnt to death by some of his statespeople a few days ago—or else killed by their vivisections. The savages burn their victims by an external application of caloric, but the New Yorkers consider this more properly an internal remedy, and thus they differ. There is a much greater difference between inanimate matter and organized life. On this difference I rest my hope; by it I demonstrate the logical existence and immortality of the soul, by the following argument. An inanimate object is the union of its component parts, the personality of which constitute its identity, and these parts cannot be changed without destroying or partly changing its identity. For instance, if I hav a knife that consists simply of a blade and the handle, and I lose the former, I may replace it with another one, but by doing so I would partly change the identity of the knife, and if I then lose the handle, and replace it with another one, I hav wholly changed the identity of the knife; in other words, I hav another knife. Now, if some one else finds the lost blade and handle and puts them together, he will hav the original knife, but if he destroys these pieces, its identity will be annihilated. The identity of an organized body, on the contrary, is not attributable to that of its component atoms, for these are changed in accordance with a process of absorption and deposition, which begins with life and ends with death, and renews the human body in about seven years.

Whence this difference? If the identity of the individual is not that of his component matter, it must be that of another entity—an immaterial one—in other words, it must be this other entity which appropriates matter with its inherent force and regulates it to conform to the personality of itself (which is also that of the individual whose personality is preserved thereby), and finally discards it. This entity is superior to force and matter, since it controls them. Therefore it can survive the dissolution of material conditions, and being a primary entity it is necessarily immortal, like matter, space, and time. I will call this entity the soul. Let me recapitulate this argument. Inertia is a property of matter, which consequently cannot start itself, stop itself, or change its direction; therefore if the molecular movements of a body be changed or the motion of the body itself be established, accelerated, checked, stopped, or changed, the power doing this is external to matter, but inseparable from it nevertheless, if only manifested by material effects; and this power is force, because it is named so. An entity which adapts, directs, regulates, controls, and discards matter with its inherent force, thereby transferring itself from one material identity to another one indefinitly, as one might change his raiment entirely by continued patching—is the thing transferred, not the thing put on; a primary entity, not a secondary one. It is superior to the latter, because it does control it. And such an entity, that which is superior to matter, is logically and analogically immortal. Let us consider the fire. The live coals symbolize the body, the heat and light the soul. These phenomena survive a succession of material entities. This seems to impair the value of my argument, but I think that it confirms its truth. As light and heat are identical phenomena, I prefer to use the latter in illustration, for it may be so colored that its identity is cognizable. Several substances may burn with different colors, but each color ceases on the destruction of the substance that produced it, and other light and heat follow the combustion of additional substances. This proves that the identity of the light is that of the substance. Therefore one is not more transferable than the other. And the magnitude of these phenomena, other things equal, is proportional to that of the substance. These premises with their deduction are quite as applicable to the effects produced by burning one substance continually, but in this case the individualities of the entities are not apparent. And there is nothing in these phenomena analogous to the preservation of a memory, which may be retained in the mind unconsciously during many renewals of the brain and body. This logic is also applicable to a stream. I understand the word stream as simply an appellation to denote that part of a moving mass of matter which lies between two points known respectivly as its source and mouth. Do the above considerations explain why we hav never identified intelligence with any of the manifestations of the mineral kingdom? Certain comparativly unknown electrical phenomena, by apparently disregarding certain laws, seem almost to imply an intelligence. But this is not proved.

I invented the theory of the transformation of character to explain why the New Yorkers are more savage than other Americans, but this theory is not proved. It has a bearing on the subject under consideration, but I can only allude to it here; so take it for what it is worth. Ye who believe in mesmerism, and believe that its founder mesmerized persons "at wholesale," by inducing them to touch a tree that he had mesmerized by a conscious effort of the mind, can hardly deny that the strong emotions of an individual may exert unconsciously a magnetic effect on things around him, and remain inherent in his component matter after he has discarded it and passed into oblivion. Consider the aboriginal inhabitants of New York state. Were not these the most aggressiv, brutal, and bloodthirsty of all the tribes of America? Does not their spirit seem to hover over the land, to be identified with mount and valley, rock and tree? Is not their component matter revivified in us? Consider our rulers, the Irish; consider their history from "way back." "Ireland, called the land of ire, for the constant broils therein for four hundred years" (Lloyd's State Worthies. Article, The Lord Grandison). Put these considerations together, and then marvel that "New Ireland" is what it is if you can, but do not blame me because I cannot do so. This theory explains why a certain knife that falls into susceptible hands may accomplish many suicides, and why the same automaton often works better in familiar than in more competent hands. Matter, like the hypothetical "elephant under the earth," and the "God" in the Constitution, and all other gods, for that matter, has no actual existence; the phenomena that are ascribed to it are perceptible to one or more of our personal senses, or made so by physical appliances; like those gases that only indicate their presence by the space they occupy. The soul is not perceptible to any one of the senses; its existence can only be proved by logic. That which is eternal has existed always, but the recollection thereof may be a question of time, and a matter of circumstance. The traveler who scans the landscape from a moving train, forgets the past as he notes the present, or only remembers those features of special interest which would be supplanted by others as important, and be rediscovered at regular intervals in the course of time, if the journey were infinit, and the mind more finite than its circuit. All nature moves in circuits, and it is said "there is nothing new under the sun." Is man an exception? No experience can be remembered eternally, except it be recalled at intervals forever. I cannot remember of previously living in a city as badly governed as this one; of seeing so many Irish in power at one time (less "power to them"); of meeting a people identical in cussedness with the Yorkers; of seeing persons actually starving because they were too poor to buy the legal right to labor, and they could find no one to purchase it for them on commission; of being assaulted myself without provocation, nearly every week in the year; of hearing women insulted in public places; of holding my breath as I passed decaying animals in the streets. I do not remember of a previous life of this description; but if my circuit leads through such scenes at certain periods, I can bear it, because I am obliged to; but I would forget it as soon as possible. We cannot recall an incident in a moment, and sometimes it is only by associating a more recent event with it that we recollect it at all. Life is but a momentary part of eternity, and to me it is like a delusion, the dream of an entity that is eternal. I know nothing concerning its destiny. I know no more regarding its future state; it is a mental entity which I hav shown creates its environment now, in accordance with circumstances that will then be changed. It preserves the memory, and we often recollect an idea or a feeling that has been retained by the soul unthought of during many renewals of the brain and body; and therefore could not hav been retained by force, or any materialistic agency. This philosophy explains why two eggs, apparently alike, and chemically the same, may produce very different chickens; and it is that which is in the seed that determins the nature of the plant. It concedes an immortal entity to plants and animals, and I am glad of it; it concedes an immortality to the New Yorkers, and I cannot help it. I hav stated other considerations on this subject in an article entitled, "Ideal Materialism," which was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER February 15th. I began this article with the intention of proving "Ideal Mortality," but as I wrote, I reasoned; I am seeking the truth, and my mind has changed. I am not sorry that it has changed, for now, although I liv in New York, I need not die in despair. I am a young man, but I hav lived a long time, and hope deferred has made me heart-sick. I hav seen that life is a season of disappointment; a period that must be spent by the masses in an unequal contest with adversity. To these persons, Hope is an angel of light, for she throws a radiant effulgence on the portentous clouds of probability; making them shine with an illusiv splendor as uncertain as the rainbow, or as vain as the reflected glories of a departing sun. We trust Hope although she deceives us; for when Reason can offer but little to encourage us, the uncertain promises of Hope cheer the heart and divert the mind. Sometimes I feel that "I would not extinguish the faintest star of hope that has ever shone on the night of life;" that "Hope springs eternal in the human breast," and we must trust or perish. "Hope has been whispering the word immortality to Love throughout the ages." I know of nothing better than to liv for the present; love for eternity; hope always. I trust that when my soul is released from material conditions, it will be well; for these tend to its discomfort, and they cannot contribute much to its happiness. JULIAN MARCELLAS.

THE MATERIALIST'S IDEA OF MAN.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your correspondent's attempt to demonstrate the existence and the immortality of the soul is, alas, like all such efforts, based entirely upon false premises. First, he attempts to establish idealism, denying to our senses the capacity to perceive matter. Denying reality—affirming a vague hypothesis! Investing with reality phenomena which, apart from matter, hav no existence. Divesting matter of tangibility, actuality, absolute being, etc., and investing its outline, form, color, or activity with such attributes.

Idealism is philosophy gone mad, science burlesqued, and knowledge perverted. It insists that everything is nothing and nothing everything. It denies facts as plain as A B C and postulates theories as obtuse as a Latin litany. It revels in mystery and, apparently, refuses to accept the simple truth because every school-boy can understand it.

Here is a rock. If these idealists don't believe in the reality of matter composing the rock let them bump their heads against it. They say we do not see matter, but only its outline, color, motion, etc. These alone are real, the matter in the rock is hypothetical, as if the attributes of a rock could exist without matter.

Conceding that we cannot see, grasp, or comprehend the ultimate atom, precisely as we are unable to grasp the ultimate all, the eternal and infinit, yet as we can trace matter (aggregated atoms) to lesser and lesser forms until even by the aid of our strongest lenses they evade our vision, so we can logically postulate that matter is the only basis of all phenomena, and every form but a collection of the invisible material particles which in lesser or greater aggregation shape and constitute every phenomena in the universe.

If existence is a fact, the universe real, phenomena reliable, and knowledge a correct guide, Materialism is the only true philosophy and idealism a ridiculous farce. Material existence in the abstract—substance in infinit aggregation, which in ever diversified conditions is supposed to exist in and fill boundless space—could not possibly exist without exhibiting to the senses its several forms, outlines, attributes, and phenomena. To say that because we see matter in motion, in form, of certain color, etc., we only see the form, color, and motion, is absurd, because all forms are matter, and color, shape, etc., only concomitant or incidental to it.

Let us view "L'Angelus." When Millett had completed his picture, he did not create from nothing an entity. It was simply matter in the form of paints and oils which his deft genius distributed with exquisit touch over the canvas, and which matter then existed simply in different relation and form than before he commenced his work. This work of art now is simply canvas, paints, and oils, and nothing else. And when we examin its component parts in detail, if we place a microscope upon any portion of its surface, we behold no picture, but simply matter in the form of paint. This matter in tout ensemble represents "L'Angelus." In its constituents it is only matter.

Suppose the picture were consumed by fire. If idealism were true, the form of the picture being the only reality and matter only hypothetical, we would behold a case of annihilation, of something being transposed into nothing, a natural impossibility. On the contrary, it must be conceded, if every picture in the world were burnt, not a single particle of the matter composing them would be lost.

If it be conceded that existence is reality, that the universe is a fact and not a dream, then it absolutely follows that matter is the basis of all phenomena and life in the universe, and that it is matter, assuming in infinit variation and aggregation all the different forms of organic and inorganic life.

As infinit space and time may be logically predicated, so the ultimate invisible atom, though beyond the grasp of human vision, is nevertheless an absolute reality. Now, as it assimilates or unites with other atoms in indefinit number, these forms become visible, first to our aided sight, then to our normal vision.

These forms or combinations of atoms may then properly be called matter, and in greater aggregation compose worlds, suns, systems, rocks, trees, flowers, and men, and to deny the existence of the substance composing them is to deny existence, the universe—all!

Your correspondent's second premis is equally false, namely: "Inertia is a universal property of matter." This fallacy, though still taught in some of our schools, has indeed been effectually exploded. There is no such thing as inertia, or dead matter. All matter is physical and chemical force, capable, of its own potencies, in infinit variations, to produce every visible result. No matter can exist independent of force, and vice versa. Therefore all matter is force and all force matter.

A rock, soil, dust, sand, a grim skeleton, all contain within themselvs every physical and chemical attribute to assume innumerable other forms dependent upon other forces surrounding them. These changes go on for ever and ever, from the homogeneous to the heterogeneous, from the inorganic to the organic, from the infinitly small to the giant man or giant star in distant space. And these processes need no assistance or aid from any outside agent or "divine being" to evolve into any existing form. In fact, a God causing vegetation, animal or human life, or the formation of a planet, infinitly increases existing mysteries, as the "divine" methods are vastly more incomprehensible to us than the natural.

Third: He bases his faith in the existence of an "immaterial entity" (without defining its component parts, however) existing independent of and surviving the body, upon the fact that memory and individuality survive the physical changes taking place in the body every seven years. It is supposed our bodies are "renewed" once in every seven years, but as memory survives these changes it is concluded by Spiritists in general that this is ample proof that an independent "immaterial entity" (whatever that is) or "spirit" (another name without a meaning) inhabits the ever-changing body.

But here our good friends overlook the very important fact that there is a vast difference between a jack-knife and a man. The one is inorganic, the other organic. Mind, consciousness, individuality, memory, etc., are purely the result of living, complex organic bodies which, in their perfect, living state generate these mental processes, very much as a battery generates electricity. And while to sustain this animal life of the human organism food, digestiv, circulating, and respiratory processes, assimilation and absorption from within, are essential, and necessitating, of course, continuous "deposition" (as our friend calls it), exhalation, secretion, and excretion from without, this by no means affects the general tout ensemble of the organism, which, by its involuntary physical processes, generates and sustains mind independent of the chemical changes going on in the body. It is the automatic action of the complete machinery of the body, which is not at all disturbed by the chemical changes going on, and which, being continuous from birth to death, continues all mental processes regardless of the waste and repair processes going on.

Thus the identity of the individual depends upon the continuous action of the machine generating mind, and not upon the identity of the chemical particles composing it. And this assimilating and excreting process of the human automaton is so gradual and delicate, so entirely different from the jack-knife operation, that only those thinkers who will not see, or those who are intellectually muddled and dull, would make the comparison.

In fact, there is no analogy in nature for the dual or perpetual existence of man. No phenomenon—world, sun, tree, flower, or man—is eternal. As all began in time, so all must end in time. The tree cut down is dead, and if it sprouts again it is a new tree that sprouts—analogous to parent and child, but not to the eternal existence of the parent. The fire spoken of as an argument for immortality! What folly! Where is the fire, light, and heat when the fuel is consumed? Gone out forever as such phenomena. New fuel may burn, new fire and light be ushered into existence—analogous to succeeding generations—but the new fuel will also burn out and the new light and heat vanish, precisely as the new generation will die as all those who lived before them.

Space forbids me to further follow our despondent, rambling brother's argument. Did I believe in eternal individual life—which implies compulsory existence during all eternity—I, like him, would despair indeed! For immortality, when conceived in its deceptiv reality, were indeed a terrible fate. To fully realize all it implies; not to liv at option as long as existence may be agreeable, perchance a few hundred, a thousand, or a million years, but eternally, forever—though existence be a burden, a curse; then, to realize that man is doomed, nay, damned, to liv on and on forever and ever—even through all the cycles of endless time—the blessed boon of death forever denied us, this, indeed, is a fate so terrible, so awe-inspiring, that an actual "Calvinian hell" could only be compared with it.

In further confirmation of my views I must shortly present a few facts. During the carboniferous period animal life was not possible upon earth. Now, if "spirits" hav no end in the future, they could not hav had a beginning in the past. What has a beginning must end, and what has no end could not hav had a beginning. Well, where were the "spirits" or the eternal existing "immaterial entities" of those now living at the time when animal life was impossible on this globe? Where was Julian Marcellas's "mind-entity" or soul, then, or where was it before his father and mother were born? And if Mrs. Marcellas had married Mr. Jones, where and what would his "mind-entity" be now? Might it not possibly hav become Susan Jones instead of the illustrious litterateur bearing the classical name he now calls his own?

Why do not "Spiritists" tell us something about existing "mind-entities" never born by women? If space is filled with "souls," "superior to force and matter," which "control existing human beings," planning and scheming to enter one, but thus to be ushered into existence a helpless infant, voluntarily assuming all its ills, pains, and grievances, why do not some of these eternal-in-the past-and-future entities reveal themselvs to man, make known their presence, and giv us the benefit of their superior eternal minds and accumulated knowledge incident to eternal existence? Or is it possible that these superior, transcendent "mind-entities" should hav existed for all eternity and still be ignorant as the baby in which they voluntarily choose to become incarnate? (!)

"Superior to force and matter." Indeed! This is something new under the sun, surely. Superior to everything, to all. Now let our brother define what it is, and he will secure himself a niche in the temple of fame dedicated to our greatest men. He cannot do it. If "superior to matter," and he can prove it, it will still be matter, and if "inferior to matter," it will likewise be matter. If it is anything at all, it is matter, and if not matter, it is nothing.

There is not even such a thing as "matter and force." Matter is the only abstract existence—force its attribute. It exists and is force. Matter divested of force, or force divested of matter, is impossible, and when this living, vital substance, forever pregnant, struggling to move, build, form, assimilate, evolve worlds, suns, systems, trees, grain, mice, and men, changes from inorganic matter into organic forms, and finally evolutes into the higher human organism, then with the first breath, when the circulating, respiratory, and assimilating processes, general vitality, creating blood, nervous fluid, and animal magnetism—when the new-born man drinks deep from the fountain of life, then, and not till then, does the mind or mental process of man begin, and when finally, at the end of life, these processes stop, and the machine which was necessary to originate mind falls to pieces, it is but a necessary conclusion of logic to infer that mind must then necessarily end also. No Secret Society for Liberals.

I wish to protest against a secret Liberal society. If we cannot win in a fair, open way, wait till we can. The day of secret societies has gone by. Open doors, open lives, and open words are the watchwords. Light, more and more light everywhere. No more candle dips; no more oil lamps, but bright, blazing electric lights. Make clear and plain the path of all. As Whitman says:

> Unscrew the locks from the doors!
> Unscrew the doors themselvs from the jambs.

ELMINA D. SLENKER.

FAITH is in its nature unchangeable, stationary; science is in its nature progressiv; and eventually a divergence between them, impossible to conceal, must take place. It then becomes the duty of those whose lives hav made them familiar with both modes of thought, to present modestly, but firmly, their views; to compare the antagonistic pretensions calmly, impartially, philosophically. History shows that, if this be not done, social misfortunes, disastrous and enduring, will ensue. When the old mythological religion of Europe broke down under the weight of its own inconsistencies, neither the Roman emperors nor the philosophers of those times did anything adequate for the guidance of public opinion. They left religious affairs to take their chance, and accordingly those affairs fell into the hands of ignorant and infuriated ecclesiastics, parasites, eunuchs, and slaves. Intellectual night settled on Europe in consequence of that great neglect of duty.—Professor Draper.

What They Say About the Picture Book.

Charles Watts in Secular Thought.

We hav just had an hour's amusement and instruction in looking through the cartoons of "The Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" and in reading the valuable information which every alternate page contains. The book is published by the Truth Seeker Company in New York and deserves to be read far and wide. The cartoons by Watson Heston are really excellent, while the reading matter has been selected with great care and taste. The two combined afford much amusement and convey a vast amount of useful information. The general "get-up" of the book is first-class, the cartoons are clean, the paper is good, and the printing is in large clear type. It contains one hundred and eighty-five full-page illustrations.

In the Kentucky Constitutional Convention.

Before the Kentucky Constitutional Convention convened Mr. S. P. Herron sent us the names of the members and by means of our Literature Fund we were enabled to forward them documents bearing upon the questions of church taxation and Sunday laws. Two hundred and thirty-five pamphlets were distributed among them at the small cost to the fund of $13 94. We still hav a balance of $53 86 in the fund, and should be glad to hav it increased so that money may be promptly available when needed.

The seed sown has grown and blossomed, though whether it will ripen is a matter of doubt. We must not expect too much; it is a great deal that the seed should grow as well as it has. One of the amendments to the taxation clauses of the new constitution is upon impartial taxation and proposes to tax the churches. The three biggest men in the Convention—Governor Buckner, ex-Governor Knott, and Judge Hines—are in favor of the proposition, and, says a report from the Convention, if its fate were to be determined by the weighing of brains instead of counting noses it would prevail.

The report of the Kentucky commissioner of agriculture values (or rather *under*values) the church property of the state at thirteen millions of dollars. Impartially taxing this would reduce the tax on useful property a little more than two per cent. The interest in the question is, however, above this. It is one of justice. No individual should be made to pay the bills of other people's worship in any degree. A penny taken for this purpose is as great a wrong in itself as though the amount were a hundred dollars. It is this side of the question, more than the amount saved, which will influence votes, and it is because of this that we do not strongly hope for the adoption of the amendment. Noses are still more numerous than weighty brains among the people.

But there is great encouragement in the fact that two Southern states, which are peopled by a more uniformly church-going population than northern states, are considering the question. Maryland is agitated by the same ideas, and its tax commission in its last report recorded its conviction that "church members who entertain the . . . desire to gratify their taste or minister to their comfort by means of handsome or costly church property should do so at their own expense." The question is also being discussed in other localities, and secular public sentiment is undoubtedly very strongly in favor of such measures. Perhaps another decade will see justice done in this regard in many states. Meanwhile, every Freethinker should do all in his power to propagate the sentiment by writing to legislators and distributing pamphlets advocating it.

The Museums in the Park.

We do not know what reasons the World has for making this announcement, but we hope they are not baseless:

"There is now a prospect that the Art and Natural History Museums in Central park will presently be open on Sundays.

"The trustees hav at last been persuaded that there is no greater breach of Sunday in opening the front doors to the public than there has been in the 'side-door' opening of the Art Museum to favored persons which has been in vogue for years.

"The Museums ought to hav been open on Sunday from the hour when they were set up on ground belonging to the public, and began to be supported in considerable part by public money.

"Sunday is the only day on which a very large part of New York's people—those who really pay the taxes—hav leisure to visit museums at all.

"Experience in other cities has abundantly demonstrated the value of Sunday openings in promoting popular culture as well as in affording agreeable and profitable ways to the people of passing time which would otherwise hang heavily upon their hands.

"It is reported that the only matter now standing in the way of Sunday openings here is the question of additional expense. That is not a very serious question or one that ought long to obstruct a movement so manifestly in the right direction, and of so great moment to the public."

When the secretary of the American Secular Union and the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER started the agitation for the Sunday opening of the Museums they found the trustees of the Natural History Museum a little inclined their way, but influenced by President Jessup and the officers of the Art Museum, who were adamant in their religious prejudices against Sunday opening. So determined were Jessup and the trustees of the Art Museum that they twice defeated the enactment of laws intended to overcome the expense difficulty, which they hypocritically interposed to prevent the "desecration of the Lord's day." The Natural History Museum finally opened its doors evenings, but the Pharisees controling the Art Museum delayed such accommodation on pretext that the building could not be lighted until the city put in an electric plant.

But the agitation begun then has been going on ever since, and increasing like a rolling snowball. The daily papers are all in favor of Sunday opening, and hav been generous in using space to demand it. The matter has, therefore, been allowed to rest with them and the general public, as a matter of policy by those whose only wish in the matter is to "get there" for the benefit of that same public. The religious fanatics said at first that it was only the Infidels who wanted to visit the Museums on Sunday; now they find that the vast majority of the population of New York are with the Infidels. But when these buildings are opened to the people on the people's day—which is sure to be done finally—we do not propose to let them forget that once more do they owe thanks to the heretics for obtaining a right which they were too indifferent to maintain, and of which they had been robbed by church conspirators.

The Mule Animal.

The editor of the Seventh Day Adventist journal has been reading Paine, and this short editorial is the result:

"Infidels of the present day profess to believe that bigotry and intolerance are inseparable from Christianity, that it is indeed part and parcel of Christianity. But they should learn better than this, even from their patron saint, Thomas Paine. In his 'Rights of Man,' Paine says:

"'All religions are, in their nature, mild and benign, and united with principles of morality. . . . How is it that they lose their nativ mildness, and become morose and intolerant? By engendering the state with the church, a sort of mule animal, capable only of destroying, and not of breeding up, is produced, called the church established by law. . . . The Inquisition in Spain does not proceed from the religion originally professed, but from this mule animal engendered between the church and state.'

"And again, of governments established by force, Paine says:

"'Governments thus established last as long as the power to support them lasts; but that they might avail themselvs of every engin in their favor, they united fraud to force, and set up an idol which they called divine right, and which, in imitation of the pope who affects to be spiritual and temporal, and in contradiction to the founder of the Christian religion, twisted itself afterward into an idol of another shape, called church and state.'

"Paine, Infidel though he was, knew full well, and was man enough to acknowledge it, that the doctrin of church and state was not Christian doctrin in any proper sense of the word, and it would be well if his disciples of the present day had equal discernment, and as great candor."

First, all religions are not mild and benign in their nature. Judaism was not; neither was Mohammedanism. Judaism was simple savagery; Mohammedanism began as fanaticism with a sword in its hand. Paine made his point as a Deist—and made a mistake.

There are about two hundred sectarian interpretations of Christianity—of which Seventh Day Adventism is one. Each sect imagins itself, and so advertises, to be the only "real" Christian sect "in any proper sense of the word." Therefore, until some one finds out just what Christianity is, we must take the Roman and Greek Catholic and evangelical Protestant churches as standing for that religion. These hav been and are persecutors. Bigotry and intolerance hav been a part of their practices as naturally as their worship. We speak of Christianity as history records it, and as we find it.

The first "mule animal" engendered by the Christian church was Christian Communism, in which government and religion were firmly united. The apostolic Christians withdrew from the Roman state and set up their own state—that is, they had a union of church and state as soon as they had their church. And as soon as they controled the Roman state they made their union on a larger scale. Christian priests hav always ruled their people. Christ taught—or is alleged to hav taught; for no one knows much about him—innumerable doctrins, if we take his sermonets and parables and side remarks as authoritativ, and the "mule animal" has him for a progenitor as well as those who are so fond of quoting, "Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and unto God the things which are God's." They should remember that he also commanded, "But those mine enemies which would not that I should rule over them, bring hither and slay them before me." That text was a pretty fair motto for Inquisitors.

It would be well if Seventh Day Adventists had the candor to read all of Christ's sayings and to acknowledge that the bad is as authoritativ and as really Christian as the good.

The Mormons.

Mr. Wilford Woodruff, president of the church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, otherwise known as Mormons, flatly contradicts the report of the Utah Commission, made to the secretary of the interior, in the appended manifesto, issued September 24th:

"TO WHOM IT MAY CONCERN: Press dispatches having been sent from Salt Lake City, which hav been widely published for political purposes, to the effect that the Utah Commission, in their recent report to the secretary of the interior, allege that plural marriages are still being solemnized, and that forty or more such marriages hav been contracted in Utah since last June or during the past year; also that in public discourses the leaders of the church hav taught, encouraged, and urged the continuance of the practice of polygamy.

"I, therefore, as president of the church of Jesus Christ, of Latter Day Saints, do hereby, in the most solemn manner, declare that the charges are false. We are not teaching polygamy or plural marriage, nor permitting any person to enter into its practice, and I deny that either forty or any other number of plural marriages hav during that period been solemnized in our temples or any other place in the territory.

"One case has been reported in which the parties alleged that the marriage was performed in the endowment house in Salt Lake City in the spring of 1889. But I hav not been able to learn who performed the ceremony. Whatever was done in this matter was done without my knowledge. In consequence of this alleged occurrence the endowment house was by my instructions taken down without delay.

"Inasmuch as laws hav been enacted by Congress forbidding plural marriages, which laws hav been pronounced constitutional by the court of last resort, I do hereby declare my intention to submit to those laws and use all my influence with the members of the church over which I preside, to hav them do likewise. There is nothing in my teaching to the church or in those of my associates during the time specified which can reasonably be construed to inculcate or encourage polygamy, and when any elder of the church has used language which appeared to convey such teachings he has been promptly reproved; and I now publicly declare that my advice to the Latter Day Saints is to refrain from contracting any marriage forbidden by the law of the land."

At a conference of the church held October 6th, this manifesto was sustained by unanimous vote of the ten thousand people present. The doctrin of

"celestial marriage," it will be recollected, was given in a revelation to Joseph Smith, professional prophet, and can therefore be revoked by another revelation to a subsequent prophet, which office President Woodruff holds. When the result of the vote sustaining this officer was announced, George Q Cannon, of the first presidency, showed that he is not a whit behind the Protestant and Catholic clergy in possessing information about God's doings, for he said the step was an act of God; that President Woodruff had gone into executiv session with the almighty, and the result of the session of prayer was followed by the pronunciamento of September 24th. He (Cannon) was sorry it had to be taken. He had lived in polygamy because he believed it was right and was an ordinance of God. Men had suffered for it, more than eight hundred having been confined in the penitentiary for the offense, but it was of no use fighting sixty millions of people on the subject. The Lord would hold the nation responsible for depriving citizens of the right to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience, and their sufferings were recorded in heaven, and would some day stand out as the noblest page in modern history. It went against the grain for men to accept this, he said, but he "bowed in submission to God's will." President Woodruff followed in the same strain, and said the decision was reached only after a long session of prayer.

There seems to be no doubt that the Mormons hav made up their minds to submit and practically liv up to the twelfth section of their Articles of Faith—"We believe in being subject to kings, presidents, rulers, and magistrates; in obeying, honoring, and sustaining the law." Only about twelve thousand of the two hundred thousand Utah Mormons hav ever been polygamists.

We wonder what excuse the Christians will now find for further persecuting the Mormons and confiscating their property?

Sunday Laws.

The seventh Demand of Liberalism reads:

"We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed."

This was changed at the last Congress of the American Secular Union to this:

"The repeal and prevention of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution rather than an economic one justified by physiological and other secular reasons."

Mr. C. P. Bollman, the editor of the Seventh Day Advent journal, the American Sentinel, comments upon this change as follows, and not, all must admit, without plausibility:

"This we regard as quite an important difference. Sunday is, and always was, a religious institution. It was such in the old pagan world, and it is such now in the Christian world, and we deny the right of the state to require its observance upon any grounds whatever. True, it is regarded as a holiday by many who hav no religious regard for it, or indeed for anything else, and they hav a perfect right to so use that, or any other day, so far as their fellow-men are concerned; but we deny the right of one portion of the community or state to fasten upon the other portion, that is upon the minority, no matter how small a minority it may be, the observance of Sunday, or any other day, for any reason either religious or otherwise.

"We do not deny the right of the state to make any day or any number of days legal holidays, leaving the individual citizen free to observe or not to observe such days just as he sees fit, as is now the case with the Fourth of July, and other holidays; but to require the observance of such days, or to forbid upon one day acts which are freely permitted on other days, is an abuse of the power of the state. The American Secular Union should lay the ax at the root of the tree, and 'demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday' upon any pretext be repealed."

Why not, when we can get it, hav a Sunday law making the day a holiday simply—a day not included in the laborer's week—a blank space of twenty-four hours, upon which one can "observe" or not as he chooses?

At the coming Secular Union Congress this question will probably receive attention. We cannot do more now than to call attention to the following circular which Mr. W. L. Willis, of Kokomo, Ind., is distributing over the country, "On the Sunday clause of the Nine Demands:"

"Not expecting to be able to attend the coming Congress, I will call your attention especially to the third paragraph of the Nine Demands adopted at the last Congress. For my part I want no Sunday laws, for religious, economic, physiologic, or any other secular reasons, enforced by church or state. If the churches wish, let them enforce a Sunday rest on their members, and only on them, if they are silly enough to submit.

"Justice demands laws for all days alike; that article is in line with the Blair Sunday bill, and I hope this Congress will dispose of this pious article and in its stead adopt:

"'We demand the repeal of all Sunday laws, and that no act shall be a crime on one day of the week that is not a crime on every other.'"

But, it seems to us, it will be time enough to contend over the phraseology of the clause when its enactment into law is within the bounds of possibility.

A Pleasing Letter.

"WOODSTOCK, VT., Oct. 7, 1890.

"DEAR FRIENDS OF MR. HESTON: It is just the time to agitate the question, as Mr. Heston has returned from his journey for his health. I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER that he has—a picture or two is evidence of it. Now, to show my gratitude for his return and entering upon his old business of fitting to be put into the paper weekly such pictures as he thinks will please the readers, I send for his use $10.

"Mr. Editor, please receive from me also another $10 to be distributed in whatever form or manner you think best to diffuse Freethought amongst the ignorant and thoughtless.

"Yours, etc., JOHN D. POWERS."

We are not, we think, exceeding our province, to thank Mr. Powers on behalf of Mr. Heston, for his generous remembrance. And we also thank him on behalf of the "ignorant and thoughtless" who will, through his generosity, receive literature which shall giv them knowledge and make them think.

Editorial Notes.

THE Christian Statesman, quoting Ex. xxxi, 14, 16, and referring to Isaiah's teachings, adds: "Other passages lead to the full Sabbath idea, namely, cessation from toil in order to hav a weekly opportunity for rest and worship and Christian work in fuller measure than on other days." Will the Statesman be kind enough to point out such passages?

A STATUE to Horace Greeley has been unveiled before the Tribune office. The ceremonies were begun with a prayer by Bishop Potter. It's a wonder, if spirits can make their presence manifest, that Horace did not hit the bishop a whack alongside his head. Think of the incongruity of praying for the memory of the first president of the Manhattan Liberal Club!

THE Catholic Union and Times has the kindness to announce that "the artistic genius of the Infidel TRUTH SEEKER has returned from the woods and the devil fumes again at the 'illustrations' that so ridicule his organ." An illustration ridiculing an organ is what might be called a phenomenon. A cow going backward up an apple-tree is a common spectacle beside it.

SPEAKING to a Philadelphia reporter of his refusal to rent the Academy of Music to Colonel Ingersoll for his lecture on "Art and Morality" for the benefit of Walt Whitman, the president of that institution, Mr. Alfred Baker, said:

"Religion or politics do not enter into the question at all, but we draw the line at Atheism, and positivly refuse to rent the house to lecturers who disseminate that doctrin."

Religion does not enter into the question at all, but Atheists are excluded!! What a luminously idiotic remark that is!

THE Paris correspondent of the Freeman's Journal (Rom. Cath.) reports an incident which has just taken place at the assizes court. M. Nicolas, mayor of St. Martin-le-Supérieur, refused to take the oath as a juryman, stating that as he did not believe in God he would not be bound by his oath, and that his conscience did not, therefore, allow him to take one. The president, M. Taveny, having informed him that the oath was exacted by the law, he declared that his resolution was quite unchangeable, and paid a $40 fine rather than take the oath. M. Forcioli, deputy to the French chamber, has now proposed a law, making the form of oath "upon my honor and conscience" instead of "before God."

SOME of our Kansas readers will probably remember that a few years ago a bigoted judge, named M. B. Nicholson, after granting the use of the court-room at Minneapolis, Kan., to friends of J. E. Remsburg for a course of lectures, meanly closed its doors after the first lecture, when he learned that they were Freethought lectures, and afterward boasted about how he had squelched Infidelity in Minneapolis. Kansas Liberals will please take notice that this same petty bigot is running for chief justice of Kansas on the Democratic ticket, and should think twice before helping to elevate him to this important office. Hon. Charles Robinson, who is the Democratic nominee for governor, is a stanch Freethinker. Dr. Robinson was not only the first governor of Kansas, but he was the first president of the Kansas state Liberal League. It was Governor Robinson who first introduced Mr. Remsburg to a Liberal audience.

THE editor of the Christian Advocate pins his faith to miracles. He says: "Some persons think they can harmonize science and religion by trying to account for the miracles of the Bible on natural principles. This is a blunder of the first magnitude. If there hav been no miracles, then there is no supernatural religion, and Christianity is a "cunningly devised fable." With the scientist who admits the possibility of a miracle for a special purpose in a special age, there is no difficulty in believing in Christianity. With one who takes the ground that miracles are and always hav been impossibilities there can be no compromise. If all the miracles of the Bible, except one, were explained on natural principles, the gulf would be as wide between his view and Christianity as it is now. He who believes in the incarnation of Jesus Christ can accept implicitly anything that is an unquestionable part of the inspired record. He who disbelieves either has no reason for believing anything of a miraculous nature which the Bible contains. It is not the quantity but the fact of miracle on which the issue finally turns." Exactly. Now let some Christian, no matter who or where, prove that one single, lonely miracle was ever performed—just one—one will do.

THE Christian Statesman is vehemently denouncing Pharisee Shepard's Mail and Express for publishing an article by Pauline Hall on ballet dancers. Incidentally, and of course to enforce its moral, the Statesman selects the raciest part of the article to reprint. Decolleté dresses also come in for a generous share of reprobation, and the ladies who wear them are called pretty ugly names. But in these, as in nearly all other things, the Covenanter Christians set up arbitrary and unnatural standards. "What is morality," asks Thoreau, "but immemorial custom?" Custom decides the morality or immorality of these displays. For a Scotch Covenanter woman to brazenly put on tights or an abnormally low-necked dress and show herself among her Covenanter people, would indicate that she had become lax in her standards. But for women who hav been accustomed to those things from girlhood there is no immodesty. They never think of them more than of the exposure of their hands or faces. There are virtuous, and otherwise, women among the ballet dancers, as there are among all other professions of women, and it is unmitigated nonsense to shriek against tights and decolleté dresses as do the puritanical Christians. Scotch girls do not offend in this way, but more illegitimate children are born in Scotland than in any other country in proportion to the population. Read Saladin's "Woman" if you want to know what Covenanter and Presbyterian morality produced.

MR. ROGER Q MILLS, of Texas, seems to be something of a demagog as well as Democrat. He has been stumping Wisconsin in the interest of his party, where one of the issues is the Bennett law which compels the teaching of the English language in the German Lutheran and Roman Catholic parochial schools. And this is how Mr. Mills distorted the subject:

"I cannot think of anything that would make my flesh crawl on my bones, or make me consumed with indignation, more than if I was in a state and was compelled to send my child to be taught by a man who was a blatant Infidel. Suppose your board of supervisors should employ the learned Ingersoll; he is a very talented and accomplished gentleman. But Colonel Ingersoll would not be the man that I would want to educate my child. And in every country where I am, as long as I am a free man, I will do everything in my power to hav laws changed that would compel me to send my child to a school where he could be taught there was no God, no atoning sacrifice, no sufferer on Calvary for the redemption of the sins of the world: and that there was no hell. [Laughter.] Get that doctrin into the minds of the people and the Democratic party will be ruined. [Laughter.] The Republicans will take the whole country. If you can get the revised Bible into this country, and into everybody's mind, with hell revised out of it, we would stand no show. Now that is where the Democrats stand."

All of which is unmitigated nonsense and the claptrap spread-eagleism of an irresponsible stump-speaker. It has no bearing on the Bennett law, and if it is meant as a rebuke to the supreme court for its decision excluding the Bible from the schools, it is just as silly. No one ever proposed to teach Atheism or Infidelity in the public schools, and if Mr. Mills is such a fool as not to see that teaching Christianity in them is as great a wrong to Infidels as teaching heresy is to Christians, we shall hav no hope of being able to set him right by any statement of fact that we could make. We simply protest against his lying methods.

WE desire to call the attention of those who hold religion in the schools to be a necessary part of the curriculum as the foundation of moral teachings to these words of the Independent, which, in spite of its Congregational denominationalism, is the leading religious journal of the country: "We believe in absolutely secular and undenominational public schools. . . . Our public schools used generally to hav Protestant exercises. That custom has greatly decreased, and the schools are no less the nurseries of good morals. We know that there are places where religious exercises are still conducted after the Protestant fashion; but we do not approve of it, and hav for many years expressed ourselvs clearly on the subject." It is encouraging to note also that many clergymen are occupying the same position. In Chicago there is a "Woman's Moral and Educational Union," which is circulating petitions to the school board to command the reading of the Bible in the public schools of that city. Several clergymen, Methodists, Baptists, and Presbyterians, hav refused to sign the document. One of them, Dr. H. G. Jackson, Methodist, said to a News reporter: "No, I hav not signed the petition and shall not do so. I believe the public school is a state institution and the state has no business with teaching religion. I take the position that all children should be compelled to attend the public schools, and that it is not fair to require the children of Jews, or those of some other faith that are not Christians, to read the scriptures—that is, the New Testament scriptures. The question arises, if you read the Bible in the public schools: What Bible? King James's is the Protestant Bible and the Douay Bible the Roman Catholic. Then again, we cannot read the whole Bible. Who is to select the portions that are to be read? A great many of the teachers in the schools are not Christians and then some are Protestants and some are Roman Catholics. I don't want any such person to select the portions to be read. Rather they should not be read at all. Another objection: If the teacher reads the Bible he may feel disposed to comment upon it. He may ridicule it and say it is not true, and may do a great deal of damage to the children. If you prohibit any comment he may do it by his looks. What we call morality can be taught without the use of the Bible. I claim that the state has nothing to do with religion."

Letters from Friends.

KANSAS CITY, MO., Sept. 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2 for the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." You are "a daisy!" Do it some more. Our church-members are dead in love with you!

Respectfully yours, JOHN LARSON.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Sept. 26, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am entirely satisfied with the paper. I hope we shall see the pictures again soon. They are the dash that agitates the cream. They can do no harm, and much good. Kindest regards to your whole outfit.

JOHN MONROE.

SAGUACHE, COLO., Sept. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: We shall be glad to see the pictures resumed. My friend is getting to be like me—cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. The last from John Peck is a good one on the eccentricities of the good Christian and his fabled india-rubber God. Yours truly, W. H. MONTGOMERY.

RIVERSIDE, CAL., Sept. 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The two extra books ordered are the result of a little missionary work. I will try to send some more orders, for I understand the other pictures will be issued in book form only on the condition that the present book succeeds. I vote for them, and you can count me for at least one copy. Yours truly, C. NEWTON ROSS.

GENESEE, ILL., Sept. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5—$3 for the grand old TRUTH SEEKER and $2 for the picture book. I hav taken your paper so long, I would feel lonesome without it. As soon as we read the papers wife sends them broadcast all over the land to do missionary work. Good wishes to all who are fighting against the accursed superstition.

L. G. BARNES.

RALEIGH, N. C., Sept. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to see that Mr. Heston has improved in health so as to be able to resume his labors in the pictorial department of THE TRUTH SEEKER, hoping he enjoyed his much-needed vacation. I missed the pictures greatly, but hope he will giv us some fine ones shortly. I think he fulfills the saying about fighting the devil with his own fire. JNO. T. ROSS.

HENDERSON, KY., Sept. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: In order to help along the good cause, both at "your house" and "our house," I inclose $2 to pay for a copy of "The Freethinkers' Text-Book." I am beginning to be surprised at the amount of work the Freethinkers are doing in this country. The great number and high standing of authorities quoted in their literature are creating a profound impression on new investigators, and this is quite perceptible among lawyers, physicians, journalists, etc., who do not publicly avow their sentiments for fear of Christian ostracism. T. J. STEVENSON.

EDGEWOOD, ALA., Sept. 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I distribute my TRUTH SEEKERS to those that will read them, and think that another year I can get you some subscribers. But the people here are all hard up—hav not got over the effects of the war. Most of them are very pious, very strict about keeping the Sabbath, but are very anxious to get Northern people in here to develop the country, and therefore put up with their Infidelity, which they would not do were they in better circumstances. There are a good many Northern people about here, and nearly all of them take little stock in religion. Below is a list of books that I send for. L. PULSIFER.

NAPANEE, IND., Sept. 30, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $2 for the "Text-Book." Like many others of your subscribers, I liv among a strait-laced and church-going people who push aside and refuse to read articles written on Freethought subjects. Nevertheless, light is dawning, and will surely dispel the darkness of superstition and ignorance now taught in our Sabbath-schools all over the land. The churches realize the only way to replenish and keep their numbers to the present standard is by educating the infants and children in the dogmas of their churches and repeating until the impressions made are so fixed as never to be forgotten. Some may by the aid of light and common sense reach a higher plane, and we firmly believe the numbers are increasing. JOHN HERRING.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Sept. 28, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I hope all who can will at once write to "Gray Atheist," Olive Branch, Miss., and send books and words of cheer and encouragement. If he lectures as well as he writes, he will do good work for our cause. His letter is just splendid. I only wish we could replace his cow—not as an act of charity, but as a spur to enthuse him on to success in the path he has so nobly chosen. Of course all who write him expecting a reply will inclose a stamp or two. I wish his wife would correspond with a few good Liberals, and see if she would not be convinced of the better way. I shall send him a letter and some books to-day. Go thou and do likewise.

I am rejoiced to see the pictures again. How divine (?) the scene of old David's hankerings!

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

PORTVILLE, N. Y., Oct. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR I would like to say something to encourage our lone brother at Olive Branch, Miss., and I would like to help him, but I am a poor, crippled soldier, with the magnanimous pension of $8 per month, and cannot work at all. But I know something about how he feels, for we liv in an orthodox hell here. But tell him to continue to be good and loving to that dear little woman, and she may be brought to see the right way in time. There is nothing that tells more on Christianity than for an Infidel to liv an upright, good, kind life. Tell him to let his wife read the Bible and to read it himself, but not to argue with her about it; to teach his children to be upright and truthful without the fear of an orthodox God, and if I can ever see a way to help him I will gladly do so. Cannot our Freethought friends say amen for Brother "Gray Atheist?" Inclosed find $2 for the "Pictorial Text-Book" with blank insertions for writing.

Yours for truth and fair play, JOHN R. COATS.

SEATTLE, WASH., Sept. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $8, for which please send me four copies of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book." Since receiving mine I hav secured the sale of the four herewith ordered, and expect to sell a great many more in the near future.

Freethought is thriving in the great Northwest, and I hope to see the grand state of Washington up with, if not actually ahead of, her sister states in the race for mental freedom. We shall hav the champions of Freethought, Mr. J. E Remsburg and Mrs. Mattie P. Krekel, with us for a few lectures on or about October 20th, and expect to hav a good time.

I am glad to learn through your paper of the improved condition of Mr. Heston's health, and hope he will liv long to labor for the emancipation of the minds of the people from the thralldom of superstition.

I hope to be able to send you another order next week.

Yours for the distribution of Secular literature,

R J. WILSON.

SOUTH OIL CITY, PA., Sept. 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 for the "Pictorial Text-Book." I hav been trying very hard to get you a new subscriber, but as yet hav failed. But I hope that through the influence of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I circulate among my friends, I shall in time be able to get you several. I do not know if I am the only one from Oil City. I hope not. There ought to be a great many Freethinkers here, as there are fifteen thousand inhabitants in this city, with thirteen churches and only five thousand church-goers. I am acquainted with probably half a dozen Freethinkers, and some of them are afraid to express their ideas, as they think it would hurt their business. But I hope I can open their eyes to see differently. THE TRUTH SEEKER looks a little dull at present to canvass with, as the cartoons are one-half the help in canvassing. Inclosed you will find a list of names of persons to which I wish you would send sample copies. I hope Mr. Heston has regained his health sufficiently to resume his work. Yours in true Liberal thought,

G. E. GANDELOT.

CINOINNATI, O., Sept. 21, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2, for which please send me the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." The writer and a large delegation of the Cincinnati "elect" will attend the Convention of the Secular Union at Portsmouth next month. I call this convention "the communion of saints."

Let me state a comical occurrence that occurred the other evening. A younger brother finds great sport in attending the Salvation Army hoe-downs. This evening everybody was getting in rounds of amens, hallelujahs, bless the lambs, etc., from the rear seats in such force as to shake the block. They started the song, "Heave along on the ship of Zion," and by the time the chorus was reached he had up one hundred and twenty pounds of steam and turned himself into a steam calliope to boom the chorus. Pandemonium reigned as soon as the chorus was finished. The leader jumped, raved, screeched, and pawed the air, indulged in scathing remarks about the young heathen, pointed his finger at him and screeched that "if God had intended that young man to be a steamboat whistle, he would hav attached a boiler and mud-drum to him."

The singing of the second verse was dispensed with and the young heathen withdrew. GEO. E. LIGHT.

LURAY, VA., Sept. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed a postal note for the picture book. About three years ago I joined the Farmers' Alliance, in which I worked honestly and earnestly with the hope to hasten the time when such ignorance and superstition as is known by our most intelligent of to-day would die forever. But alas, I found a majority of the members in my sub Alliance to be a bigoted, superstitious set of hypocrits. They hav expelled me on account of my religious views. They deny this, but I hope that I shall be able to prove it true. I hav demanded of them charges and specifications written, such as were preferred against me at the time of my expulsion, but from some cause I cannot get them. I suppose they hav found that they are unconstitutional. They acknowledged at the meeting of my expulsion that my actions toward them had been as good as, if not better than, those of any other member, but as I was an Infidel they felt that they were doing wrong by fellowshiping me as a brother.

Now, dear brothers and sisters for Freethought and liberty, I feel at a loss to know what to do. I hav a wife, with five boys; the boys' ages run from one to fifteen years. I do not feel disposed to send my boys to such schools as we hav here. They teach them more Christian religion than anything else. The climate is good here and the land is medium, but the progress of the people is too slow for me. If any Liberal friends will be kind enough to inform me of any place where I might do better for myself and children and where I can aid in the cause of Freethought and liberty, I shall feel very grateful to them, besides paying them for their kindness. Are there any of the readers of the grand TRUTH SEEKER that know anything about the reliability of the K. C. C. Co. people? I would love to meet with a Freethought Liberal lady at least once in this the only life.

Sincerely, M. V. DADISMAN.

LESLIE, MICH., Sept. 20, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Let us say to dear friends one and all, we as a band of honest men and women want you to investigate for yourself. Do not be humbugged any longer by a lot of humbugs that call themselvs clergy All they want is your money. The same class got their living six thousand years ago by deceiving people. It was very easy a few thousand years ago to make people believe anything. Some at that time did not believe such nonsense, and what became of them? Their heads came off. Freethinkers hav enlightened the world too much for such business to-day. Dear friends, when your clergy tell you not to associate with Freethinkers and investigators, remember they want your money. Dear friends, investigate for yourselvs, and you will be much happier than now, and know much more than now. It has always been the aim of the clergy to keep people in ignorance. In that way they can get their living very easily, and not hav to work. They are a class of men too lazy to work for a living. Friends, as we hav said before, investigate for yourselvs and you will find that this planet has been millions of years working to be what it is to-day. Send to New York to THE TRUTH SEEKER office and get Professor Denton's works on geology, that will prove to you that it was millions of years ago that this planet was thrown off from the sun, just as others are thrown off to-day, and by perpetual motion they became cooled off and became what this is to day. Then how false is the Bible statement that the world was created by "God" six thousand years ago!

MR. AND MRS H. HAYNES.

TAMPA, FLA., Sept. 23, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $2 for the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." I am very anxious to see the "Text-Book." I know it must be very interesting. We hav quite a body of Freethinking people here, and we need some one to giv a few good lectures on this subject in Tampa. As it is now, it seems to be all on one side, and hell owns that side. For the more the preacher preaches up a hell of fire and brimstone, and calls them rascals, thieves, and all sorts of bad names, the better they like the preacher, and he can scare the money right out of them by the dollars, and not only money but land and city lots. They hav to hav hell, Christ, and the devil in their fraudulent business to keep it in running order. Murderers and notorious rascals belong to this would-be righteous class of people. Their idea is to serve God, and their god is money, and there is no better way of making money than to be on hand with your pitch-forks and play the devil with the sinners and make them toe the mark for so much, from $1 up to $100 or more. If they hav not got the money, then the preachers demand land, horses, cattle, or anything that will satisfy their god of Greed.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is a terror to this class of people, and when they can get hold of one they tear it up and burn it, and then mention in their prayers to God what a good thing they hav done, and wish to be rewarded with a crown of glory in the sweet by and by. Nevertheless, THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing a great deal of good, and people of intelligence are beginning to think for themselvs.

Yours truly, C. W. WELLS.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS., Sept. 25, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The egotistical editor of Egotism, a paper devoted to the Utilitarian philosophy, and published at San Francisco, ridicules the offer of the American Secular Union for a manual of instruction in morals free from dogmatism, describing it as a Bible for Freethinkers to be published by authority, and so on. If the egotistical editor of Egotism had read the circular published by the American Secular Union when this offer was made, he would know that what the Union called for is not an ethical treatis, still less a moral code, but a manual for teachers designed to illustrate the best practical methods of teaching morality without invoking the aid of superstition. It is difficult to see what the egotistical editor of Egotism could find to object to in that. But the egotistical editor of Egotism is the most dogmatical person now posing as a Freethinker, always except Tucker. To read his paper anyone would imagin that the doctrins of utility in their baldest shape were an original and epoch-making discovery of his own, instead of a philosophy as old as Aristippus, from which Freethinkers so carefully educated as John Stuart Mill and Herbert Spencer hav receded, on the ground that it proves nothing or too much—that its fundamental maxim, "Men seek pleasure and avoid pain," is not universally true, unless the words pleasure and pain are used in so broad a sense as to make it a mere truism. If it means only that everyone who can does as he likes, then, indeed, it is true, but also undisputed and inconsequential. It sheds not a ray of light on such questions as why one man likes to shut himself in a dark cell in company with a skull and a hymn-book, while another likes to command a schooner of pirates; why one goes without his dinner to add twenty-five cents to $100,000, while another likes to spend his last red cent for whisky. These and similar problems are elucidated only by the law of evolution, which has made the dogmas of Jeremy Bentham antiquated. All this the egotistical editor of Egotism ignores, which he has a right to do, for there is no objection to any creature's braying, if, as the poet would say, it is his nature to. When, however, the egotistical editor of Egotism undertakes to ridicule the ideas of others, he should first know what they are.

C. L. JAMES.

ROANOKE, VA., Sept. 24, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Since my letter which you kindly published in your issue of July 19.h, I hav noticed what seems to me to be a growing interest in the Freethought secret society idea. In nearly every issue the necessity of more perfect organization of Liberals is pointed out by one or more writers. Dr. C. E. Boynton's letter which you published September 20th is to the point. I like that letter, and the man for writing it; and I wish every Freethinker in the land could and would read and profit by it. He says very truthfully, "Now is the time to organize, for stormy times are coming for Liberals by and by." And I repeat my former question: Why should we Liberals continually expose ourselvs in the open field while our treacherous, hypocritical enemies take advantage of every ambush, every subterfuge, every kind of subtlety, not to convince or convert us but to damage and ruin us. The difference between us now and what we would be if we were organized into a good, strong, secret society, is the difference between a good well-disciplined, well-officered, well-armed army and a disorganized mob armed with sticks, stones, and bludgeons. Some of your correspondents seem to fear that it will damage the American Secular Union. It appears to me it would hav the opposit effect, that it would be a great help to it.

The American Secular Union is doing good work for a specific purpose. As I understand it, its aim and object is the separation of church and state. That is good and proper, but Freethinkers want more. We want not only separation of church and state, but we want equality, sociality, education, friendship, assistance, and sympathy when in trouble, protection when assailed, and justice all the time. When we come to die we would like to hav some one near us who we could feel was a tried and true friend, whom we could trust to see that our last wishes were respected and faithfully carried out, that would see that our loved ones were not robbed and degraded when we are past protecting them. Our friend Reynolds criticises rather severely the Los Angeles Assembly of Progress. I do not know much about it, but if it is simply a life-insurance and sick-benefit society then it is not in my opinion all we want, although it may be an excellent society for what it was intended.

Let us hav a good, strong Freethought secret society. I am ready to join any twenty good men and start it at once almost anywhere. JOSIAH FRIEND.

OKETO, KAN., Sept. 14, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: While no practical organization exists in this part of man's heritage, Freethought principles are steadily gaining ground.

There are several causes that lead to this conclusion. This season is the first that baseball has been played on Sunday in these parts. God's folks, who never could endure the sight of rational enjoyment, threatened arrest on all sides, but the boys kept right on, and the wind passed over.

I see in the last issue you class ministers as beggars, but the old adage that "beggars may not choose" does not apply to them, as the following illustrates.

Some time ago as hard a looking pilgrim as ever bore the image of God floated into these parts and announced himself as the "master's servant," and his business as that of "saving souls." He at once obtained the use of a school-house and went into "business." After preaching "salvation's free" for some time to half a dozen old crones and a few school-children, he gave them to understand that unless the "master's servant" got his hire, he would shut up shop; so the hat was passed. But the amount obtained was so despicably small that it was concluded to canvass the neighborhood and to leave the plunder obtained at the house of a certain good sister. Shortly after, the son of the good sister waited upon me, and after stating his case asked what I could do in the premises. Now, I happened to be in the same circumstances as a man I read of in a certain old book—"gold and silver had" I none; but being desirous of giving the "servant" a lift, I sent him my hoe. And a very good hoe it was. But notwithstanding the usefulness of the tool, and the generous intentions of the donor, it was rejected with disdain, and I got no end of abuse for presuming to "monkey" with a servant of the most high. However, he needs no hoe now, for he undertook to follow the example of the master, except that he rode off one horse instead of two asses, and he is now in the penitentiary, where anyone is liable to be who follows the teaching of the "good book" too literally. So you see there is a distinction between beggars and ministers No one will perhaps dispute that they are closely allied—belong to the same genus—but you see the accidents that attach to one are not common to both, and I believe any naturalist who is acquainted with the "varmints" will agree with me in my observations.

Some time ago one of your subscribers objected to the publishing of economic questions. Now I will state that I hav received a great deal of information on economic and sociological questions that hav been incidentally brought up in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I am sorry that that class of correspondents is on the decrease, as it seems to me. Rawhiding ghosts becomes monotonous with me, notwithstanding they richly deserve the severe castigations they are continually receiving from the doughty Freethinkers. I am pleased to admit that a very large percent of Freethinkers hold correct views on economic problems, but all do not, as is evidenced by our Prohibition friend from Massachusetts, who sees no difference between the ownership of land and the ownership of a horse.

Before closing I wish to return my thanks to T. E. Longshore for his able contributions. JOHN A. MAYHEW.

OLIVE BRANCH, MISS., Oct. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Last Sunday morning, as is my custom, while the birds were yet singing their morning carols I saddled my horse and rode into the village of Olive Branch, Miss, to get my mail. On arriving at my designation I found the town almost deserted, but soon hearing shouts from the depot bent my steps thence, and found nearly the entire male population awaiting the arrival of an incoming excursion train. The train pulled in in a few minutes, and everybody present except myself, the postmaster, and the depot agent embarked, with farewell shouts and jubilant huzzas. After I had got my mail and stored it in my saddle-bags, the postmaster, who was on his way to Sunday-school, gave me a cordial invitation to go with him and recite in his Bible class. I was not in a hurry, and accepted. We found on our arrival at the church about a score of old ladies and gentlemen and three little boys, the former angrily discussing the impiety of the young people absenting themselvs from Sabbath-school to go off on an excursion, many of them denouncing a law that would allow excursions on Sunday. Well, our lesson was from Dan. v, about Belshazzar's drunken revel and the handwriting on the wall. We all read in concert, and then came the questions. When my turn came I ventured to ask how a man's hand could write upon a wall unless a man wrote therewith. "Oh," said the teacher, "the Lord himself did the writing!" Said I, "By reference to the fifth verse here, you will see that the king saw the fingers of a man's hand writing on the wall"—and giving them no time for interruption I proceeded to say that—"the king was probably so near intoxicated that he could see snakes, toads, and anything more that he in such condition was capable of conceiving in his vision; and besides, if it was, as is here stated, a man's hand that did the writing, then it cannot be otherwise than that it was written by a man, for all parts of the body as a whole constitute a man and a hand separated from the man could not possibly in a literal sense be a man's hand. A ship with a mast is complete; then the mast of such a ship would be a ship's mast, but separated from the ship it would be only a mast. And a hand separated from an arm, from a man, would be a hand but not a man's hand. Then some man in the audience must hav done the writing; and in such case where is the miracle of the matter?" There was only a few of us, no children except three, and while I thus addressed them they winked at each other and seemed to hav agreed that they were getting me into a trap. When I paused, one asked if I knew of any language similar to the words that were then written? "Oh, yes," said I, "'Mine! mine! tea-kettle upsettin',' is quite a similar phrase." A ripple of laughter, half suppressed, went through the class, and one brother asked me if I had not been reading Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason." "No, my friend," came the reply, "but I hav been reading the Bible, and any man who reads the Bible understandingly must then and there become a doubter." After my quoting many D.D.s' opinions to them that the book of Daniel was not inspired, our class retired, and the school soon after adjourned. I was given a cordial invitation to come again, to leave my skepticism at home and recite with them as a believer. I declined as cordially, for I think I can find better company with John Peck and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

ATHEIST.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Oct. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: "One word more" on Prohibition—merely an informal chat in the friends' "love feast" department. I wish to return thanks for a goodly number of letters and cards commending my article in No. 36. One brother avers that every sentence was an unanswerable, undebatable declaration of self-evident truth, except possibly I might be mistaken in my figures as to loss of population. I explained to Brother Mack at the time that those figures were taken from the Kansas City Times, and I could not of my own personal knowledge vouch for their accuracy. But questions of principle, of truth, of right, hav little to do with "figgers."

If the Times statistician meant to giv actual decrease from population of 1885 they may possibly be too high, but if to show shortage in 1890 from what it ought to be according to ratio of increase prior to hostilities in 1885, then it is infinitly too low. For instance, our state census in 1885 gave this city 36,000. Our United States census in 1890 givs us 20,000, a loss of 16,000 in five years. Our county assessor in his official report assigns as the cause Prohibition. If this percentage of loss prevailed throughout Kansas and Iowa then the figures given were not half high enough.

No, no, I never debate with a Prohibitionist who has passed into the second or third stage of his disease. It is no use. They are past cure. Besides, it involves a sacrifice of self-respect that I do not feel called upon to make at my advanced age. Their first argument is, "You're a liquor lover, a rum-sucker, a saloonist," etc., and their subsequent "reasoning" is like unto church fair soup. My statements and logic are proper subjects for criticism, but my personal habits are no concern of meddlesome, holy-horror prudes, or back-door-smelling sneaks. Whether I am a tea-totaler, a light, a moderate, or a hard drinker, the social mud-larks, gutter-snipes, and innuendo-slingers of Comstockian, puritanic Prohibition must find out for themselvs. I shall not tell. The only honest, sane temperance worker I hav heard of for five years is the great and good Francis Murphy, who declares that Prohibition promotes intemperance. He is working successfully in the old way, and the rabble of cranks who are dying to inject Prohibition into a perishing world with squirt-guns are throwing all the obstacles they can in his way.

That document sent out by the Prohibitionists of Kansas, published as standing matter in their Massachusetts Voice, and recently smuggled into the over-indulgent TRUTH SEEKER, for truth, regardless of its character, contains more infernal lies, and bigger ones, to the square inch, than any campaign election dodger I ever saw. Thirty-three of the most unqualified falsehoods in the space of ten inches! I refer to Moses Harman, or any other Kansas Liberal, for corroboration. Of course it givs a few truths, such as: "There is not a distillery or brewery in operation in Kansas," "the people are beginning to see the results," and "the taxpayers begin to feel it." Alas, that is too true. My taxes in this and Doniphan counties are five per cent. A Wyandotte paper says: "This county pays $26,000 costs for liquor prosecutions last quarter. Prohibition comes high, but the Republican party will hav it." Certainly, no whisky, beer, or wine is made in Kansas. Our money goes to Missouri, Kentucky, Wisconsin, and California, for those important factors in civilization.

That creature Bradford is the most rotten demagog and crazy Prohibition crank in Kansas. He is making a fortune out of the business, and is to Prohibition what Moses was to the Jews, an aggressiv ripper, despoiler, and boodler. Neither Martin nor Humphrey was ever governor of Kansas in fact—only in theory. They were political prostitutes, the abject tools of the Prohibitionists and did their bidding. The idea of putting such witnesses on the stand as will put Davis, Beauregard, and Seemes on the stand to prove the beneficence and "success" of secession! When fifteen hundred leading men of Kansas once met in convention at the capitol to ask Governor Humphrey to resubmit Prohibition, their request for so much as a conference even was insultingly refused. Thirty thousand Republicans and one hundred thousand Democrats enrolled in resubmission clubs and yet the saintly liars of Prohibition, and all their tools, hav the unparalleled mendacity to declare that there is no demand for resubmission, that "resubmission is as dead as slavery." But slavery is not dead. The clanking of its chains is heard all over our land, and there are professing Liberals who are aiding the church to rivet the fetters of bondage still more tightly. As to Ingalls, like Benedict Arnold, he would sell out the liberties of his country for a few eighteen per cent Kansas mortgages. Yet no one living has a deeper detestation for Prohibitionists than he. "The unsexed of both sexes," "the he-women and she men," "the obscene birds of politics," "the capons and epicenes of society," are a few of the choice expressions he has hurled at them. More bitter, stinging terms of disrespect and derision could not be invented. More galling words of contempt could not be uttered.

The United States collector's office in this city shows nineteen hundred joints in Kansas licensed by Uncle Sam, and God only knows how many unlicensed "boot-leggers," "coat-tailers," and "gopher-holers" there are dispensing vile rotgut that makes a man feel, as an old Kentuckian sorrowfully told me, "as if he had a litter of kittens in his belly."

Aside from the class who buy their liquor of local dealers, hundreds of thousands order and receive it by express. Prohibitionists and ladies usually buy at drug stores, where the price is uniformly fifteen cents per pint for poor liquor. When the stuff is called for the druggist lays a pencil and book, the size of a check-book, on the counter and, while he fills the order, you write your complaint in the blank and sign it. "Debility," "chills," "cold," "snake-bite," etc., are the usual diseases given. Sometimes druggist rattles out, "You swater-that," but more often this legal sacrament is omitted. A lady told me that, instead of signing, she grabs the bottle, fires the book at the druggist's head, and runs. The book is never passed to a customer who the druggist is satisfied will not giv him away, as he is taxed five cents for every sale on the book. Behind the prescription case, however, all formality is dispensed with, the only condition being internal capacity and the ability to pay and walk. Our Kansas druggists are firm on that point—they will not bother to hold a man up and pour liquor into him with a funnel—they must draw the line somewhere.

Out of these nineteen hundred joints, Leavenworth, the beautiful "metropolis of Kansas," is accredited with one hundred and fourteen. A limited number run under sufferance at $100 per month, which the marshal puts into the treasury. The balance are hunted for as we boys used to hunt for chipmunks', squirrels', and bees' nests to rob them of their treasures. If found, with liquor in sight, they must either "hush up" the police, or giv up the goods and fixtures, which are destroyed. The poor devil is arrested and dragged into court, then come trial, costs, delay, acquittal of the many and fine and imprisonment of the few. Of the thousands of commercial men who range our state, not one reports inability to get all he can drink anywhere in it. There is not a man in Kansas who ever went thirsty for an hour for lack of opportunities to quench his thirst. Prohibition prohibits—on paper only. We are fighting Prohibition on principle, and not, as shallow minds might suppose, because our rations of grog hav been shut off.

Our "star chamber," "law and order league" conspirators are all blatant churchites, mostly Methodists. They employ professional informers—spies, spotters, decoys, detectivs, etc., all scoundrels, sneaks, and villains of the deepest dye. Any law that is manifestly so unreasonable and unjust in its purpose, so odious and so loathsome in its provisions, so outrageously flagrant and proscriptiv in its violation of human rights, and so abominably disgusting and obnoxious to public sentiment that it will not be respected or obeyed, and cannot be enforced except by the aid of such damnable methods, had better go unexecuted. It is more honored by being trampled under foot. The remedy is a thousand times worse than the disease.

Ill health and business labors now compel me to drop the subject indefinitly. S. R. SHEPHERD.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Blue Autumn Lily

A little blue lily that bloomed in the fall
With scarcely a flower around her,
Was scorched with the frost, the hot sun, and all,
Yet lovely wherever we found her;
She held up her head so brave and so sweet,
When everything else was dead at our feet.

The gray turtle-dove, her soul in her eyes,
Amid the box-elders sat moaning;
The jay that caught his bright coat from the skies
Was in fright to hear such a crooning;
While the lily below, with her hues like the jay,
Bade the dove cease her sighs and be cheerful and gay.

The lark, planning over her long southern flight,
Sang sweetly that others might follow;
The shrike hurried by, and glad was the sight,
When blackbirds came up from the hollow;
And the lily grew bright with the song and its cheer,
The last of her race all alone with us here.

There were brown tufted grasses and vines in the corn
That rustled the saddest of dirges,
Though glad they had waved and sung in the morn
When the sun had gold in its surges;
And all things mourning the hand of the frost,
But the lily that seemed like a child that was lost.

Where the rose had blushed red and scattered her leaves
To the night-winds wooing so early;
Now the farmer was singing, while gathering his sheaves,
That summer had blessed him so fairly.
Each useful and good, but the sweetest of all
Was the little blue lily that bloomed in the fall.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD FINCH.

Grandma's Eyes.

They wonder why I love her so;
They marvel where the magic lies
That knits me to her, they who know
That Gladys has her grandma's eyes!

They say she's but a thoughtless tot;
They say 'tis true she never tries
To pleasure me—but try or not,
She can't but please with grandma's eyes.

They say her sisters are as sweet;
It may be so, as they surmise,
But who but Gladys comes to greet
Me gayly with her grandma's eyes?

She'd hav the moon? I'd giv the sun!
What wonder that my heart denies
No draft that's made on it by one
Who always asks with grandma's eyes?

She lights up all this world of woe,
She silences e'en sorrow's cries;
She follows me, where'er I go,
Forever with her grandma's eyes.

Ah, who that knows what powers proceed
From simple things, in what strange guise,
Can doubt a little child may lead
An old man with her grandma's eyes!

With Gladys I grow young again!
I, who am gray—so fast time flies—
Am young, yet how my heart aches when
She looks at me with grandma's eyes!

My child wife smiles once more on me,
Glad tears within mine own arise,
As with my grandchild on my knee
I gaze into her grandma's eyes.

Corner Gospel.

NOTHING LIKE TRUTH.

"The truth will bear its weight," is an old and true saying.

Stick to the truth, and it brings its recompense. In order to be truthful, cultivate memory, the fine powers of sight, touch, hearing. Careful observation is a fine quality, and everyone should aim to possess it.

There are pleasant theories, easy ways of living, that are recognized as not quite right, yet are beautiful and attractiv.

But no matter how lovely, they should be put away if they are false, for they are sure to be disastrous in the end. Truth and virtue may not offer pleasure at first, but nevertheless they lead to ways of pleasantness and peace. Truth opens up oftentimes on a hard road, but it is the one thing to be desired in business, in all matters relating to true living.

It brings respect, esteem, confidence, and honor. He who will not lend himself to falsehood in any way, who is above bribery, is the one wanted in communities.

He possesses the material that makes a good, reliable citizen of this world.

A man had engaged to do a piece of work, and to hav it finished in ten days. During that time, there occurred a public holiday, which would make one day later in the completion of the work.

He wrote a letter to the person who had employed him, stating the facts and explaining the reason of delay. This man had so much regard for his word that he deemed the explanation necessary. The act, small in itself, showed that the man was worthy of highest confidence, as it proved, later, he was.

Speak the truth. Be loyal to the truth, and you can hardly go wrong.

An error confessed is half redressed.

"His word is as good as his bond," is a fine compliment. Everyone should strive to win it. S. H. W.

Peanuts Transformed.

There are medium-sized, commonplace peanuts, like some of the ordinary persons one sees every day, and out of which nothing can be made, and there are short, pudgy, self-important looking peanuts, and round, fat little peanuts that look like the wee, wee pig that couldn't get over the door sill. Then, too, there are graceful, slender peanuts, with elegant figures, resembling genteel ladies with their skirts tightly tied back, some wearing bustles, and some wearing none. If you want to turn a pile of peanuts into fanciful objects, such as hunchback men, pigs, babies in long clothes, and old women in caps, get your pen and ink, a little wax, some pins and matches, and prettily colored tissue paper.

Do you want to make a Mother Hubbard? Then select a slightly wrinkled peanut. Touch up the features of the old lady on the bulbous end of the nut. Next sharpen two matches, and stick these into her roly poly body for legs, then spur her up with two pins for arms, and there she will stand before you a weazen old woman, with a slightly bilious complexion and shrunken limbs, but an old woman capable of being improved by dress, as most women are. Therefore, fashion her a gown and bonnet out of tissue paper, and as she would hardly be complete without hands and feet, a little gum properly placed will supply these missing members.

A short, thick set peanut, provided with arms and legs and pen-and-ink sketched features, as already directed, requires only a tall paper cap to transform it into a Humpty Dumpty. With the foregoing directions, and the employment of a little care and attention, bright boys and girls can readily multiply these peanut creatures into a numerous and interesting family.

What the Mocking-Bird Said.

The mocking-bird song is a series of sharp, staccato notes, repeated again and again very rapidly, and with an accent that makes them very suggestiv of human speech. One can easily turn his whole song into words that, when repeated afterward, bring up a vivid picture of the bird with his "trillets of humor, shrewdest whistle wit," that Lanier tells about.

A mocking-bird that sang on the top of a bean pole in the garden uttered a medley something like this: "Su-ky! su-ky! su-ky! Come-he-e-e-re! Come-he-e-e-re! Mal-ory! Mal ory! Mal-ory! pe-de-de-de! poor-bo-o-y! poor-bo-o-y! Quit! quit! whe-o! qu! qu! qu! Chik-a-pe-tu! chik-a-pe-tu! chik-a-pe-tu! toll gate! toll gate! toll gate! pr-r-r-r-r! Come get it! come get it! cup-o-tea! cup-o-tea! cup-o-tea! pic-o-lo! pic-o-lo!"

Thus he would go on, half an hour at a time, in a loud, clear voice, with many turns of his wise-looking little head, jerking his long tail, and lifting his beautiful wings.

If you want to get some notion of his utterances, though not by any means of his music, you may do so by reading the above exactly as it is written in a sharp, quick way.

Correspondence.

CLEARWATER, NEB., Sept. 29, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Thanks for "Jed" and the kind words expressed in regard to "bad boys." I like "bad boys" too. I always hav spoken and never fail to speak kindly to them. This is the only way to help them.

The inclosed lines I wrote a year ago, but did not get them done in season to send you. The flower that resembles a lily is a very dark blue, and blooms right on after there hav been ever so many hard frosts, and it is the very last to succumb. I admire it for the brave spirit it exhibits under difficulties.

To those who are charitably inclined I will say now, as I meant to hav done before, that I hav held a correspondence with our poor old friend J. H. Cook for the last fifteen years, and he has not complained, till within the last few years, of how little he has to liv from. He has been, like myself, a great sufferer from neuralgia, and the cold affects him terribly. His little room is only of boards, and he can scarcely keep from freezing to death in the cold weather.

To add to this, he is afflicted with insomnia, and to lie awake through the long nights, alone and friendless, is enough to make a sympathetic person weep for such representativs of our common humanity. I hope all who can will remember him and Mr. Casey, too. The latter I hav known only through a correspondence, begun while his wife was sick and helpless so long. He now is sick and in poverty, and disliked for his Freethought principles. Had I money, as many hav, I would build no monuments except those with a roof, for aged and indigent Liberals. My heart aches for all the poor homeless wretches.

Yours for humanity, MARY B. FINCH.

[We agree with our friend that the only monuments worth erecting are those dedicated to humanity. When people are truly enlightened they will see the folly of placing costly marble and stone in cemeteries, while men and women suffer for the necessaries of life. Money will then be used to aid the indigent and to teach the art of real living so we never need become the victims of adverse circumstance.

Meanwhile our deserving Liberals should not be allowed to suffer. Those inclined to help the two referred to above can forward their contributions to the parties direct.—ED. C. C.]

WENATCHEE, WASH., Sept. 15, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for a number of years, almost as far back as I can remember. We always—that is, we children—turn to the Children's Corner first, as it is easy to understand and a great deal to learn from one small page. A little letter from this little girl, and one from that little boy, shows you are impressing the young minds and helping to build up the minds of the future citizens of our republic. My father is a Freethinker, and his children are, also. Mamma might be called a mild one too. Papa is not one that tries to make everyone believe as he does; he has his opinions and if anyone asks for them, he givs them. If I hav nothing else to do, I go to church or Sunday school on Sunday. It will not harm anyone, although I don't believe their religion nor do any of our family. We treat a preacher with as much respect as if we did believe his doctrin, and papa often asks them to say grace at dinner. I wouldn't despise a person because not a Freethinker, but feel sorry to think he should be so ignorant. I don't think any of us Freethinkers should put ourselvs on a level with the brawling Catholics and Protestants of the Middle Ages. We should all hav higher thoughts than to quarrel with the ignorant. But all the same it does me good to tell a preacher that I am an Infidel—yes, a follower of Tom Paine. Then they ask me what I go to church for. I tell them I go to study thoroughly their religion and they might return the compliment by going to hear one of our lecturers. But they think a Freethinker lecture hall is as bad a place as their purgatory, and our lecturer on a level with their devil, to lead souls on the downward road. Oh, how prejudiced and uninvestigating they are, how conceited, to think it isn't worth investigation! But after all, the Bible is losing ground. Now according to the census enumerator there are two Freethinkers to one real church-member. I hav never even seen your works, "The Story Hour" and "Apples of Gold," as it takes all my spare money to buy books I really need to study, but I will get spare money to get them some time, I hope. Papa is always ready to buy us any book we want. We hav books on almost all subjects of interest, such as history, ancient and modern, geography, productions of different poets, Spiritual and Infidel works, and even a large Bible. I like to get the Bible and read to investigate, and at other times to read with long-drawn tones to imitate some old big-nosed preacher. Well, I am taking up too much of your valuable space, so will close, hoping you will giv me leave to write some more, some other time. I am seventeen years old. HELEN MARGARET PARRISH.

[We shall always be pleased to hear from you, Helen. The Corner will keep a space for you, so write at your convenience.—ED. C. C.]

WENATCHEE, WASH., Sept. 15, 1890.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would try to write my second letter for this paper. It has been real cloudy for several days, and is clearer this afternoon, and the wind is beginning to blow. It has blown a good deal this summer. Last week there wasn't a letter in the Corner. We hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since I can remember, and I always enjoy reading the Children's Corner. We liv about four miles from school. My sister and I went to school on horseback. We went about six weeks. I study reading, spelling, writing, arithmetic, geography, history, grammar, and hygiene-physiology. I will be thirteen years old next December. I will close, hoping to see this letter in print.

Your little Freethinker friend,
LOUISE PARRISH.

And many others.

THE TRUTH SEEKER also reprints from reviews and magazines the latest papers of such eminent writers as CHARLES BRADLAUGH, PROFESSOR HUXLEY, FREDERIC HARRISON, and other English Liberal writers.

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S "Children's Corner," MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, has been elected senior member of the School Board of Fall River, Mass.

The Truth Seeker Gives all the News of Freethought, and is Always on Guard Against the Encroachments of Ecclesiastics upon the People's Liberties.

If you have any Ideas or Reforms calculated to benefit humanity write to THE TRUTH SEEKER (sending your subscription) and let the world know of them. THE TRUTH SEEKER publishes each week more letters from the people than any other paper in the world.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is devoted to the defense of Mental Liberty, of American Institutions, and the Preservation of the United States Constitution, so far as regards religious tests, and the maintenance of human rights. It advocates the abolition of all laws based on religion or religious observances. It demands the taxation of church property. It is uncompromisingly opposed to anything tending toward a union of church and state, either in name or in fact.

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

AT THINE OWN HOME.

Send 10 cents to Dr. R. P. Fellows, the noted specialist, for his "Private Counselor"—a valuable book for young and middle-aged men, suffering from a Life-wasting Disease, as the result of youthful follies, indiscretion, and excesses in maturer years. It sets forth an External Application—A POSITIVE CURE, as it matters not how long standing, how hopeless or how many remedies you hav used The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those seeking a speedy and permanent cure. Address the doctor at Vineland, N. J., and say where you saw this advertisment.

A GOOD WORD.

Dr. Fellows is an outspoken Liberal, a humanitarian, and a generous patron of the Freethought press. He has many testimonials to the value of his progressive and successful method of treatment, and deserves patronage.—Freethought.

News of the Week.

THE law which for twelve years has repressed Socialist propaganda in Germany has been allowed to expire by the emperor and parliament, against the judgment of Bismarck. Socialists are beginning to use their new freedom of meeting and publication very freely.

GEORGE BANCROFT, the American historian, has celebrated his ninetieth birthday.

REV. GEORGE BROWN, of Cortland, N. Y., has left for parts unknown to avoid arrest for bigamy.

THE explosion of six powder mills near Wilmington, Del., on the 7th, caused twelve deaths and many injuries.

PRESIDENT HARRISON is traveling through the West, where he meets with many public receptions and attentions.

REV. WESLEY BROWN has fled from Bradford, Ia., to escape the consequences of having engaged himself to five girls.

REV. MR. MOWER and Rev. Mr. Garrett on the 10th were expelled by the United Brethren of Pennsylvania, the former for immorality and forgery and the latter for connection with forgery.

THE train robber Rube Burrows, for whose capture high rewards were offered by states, railroads, and express companies, was taken at Myrtle, Ala., on the 7th. He broke jail, and after shooting two men was shot dead.

THE New York Central railroad announces that while it will in the future refuse to allow its operatives to belong to the Knights, it will permit them to join any other organization.

AT a funeral in Rome anticlericals removed a cross from the hearse by force, to effect conformity to the laws requiring civil funerals. The resistance of Catholics caused a tumult.

THE clergy in Italy are fighting the design of the government to consult hygienic ends by introducing cremation. They exclaim fiercely against "the pagan usage of crematory ovens."

TAMMANY has renominated Hugh J. Grant for mayor. The combination of Republicans and non-Tammany Democrats, headed by Protestant clergymen, which hopes to defeat Tammany, has nominated Francis Scott.

PROTESTANT women of Boston hav held a meeting and passed resolutions against the erection in that city of a memorial to John Boyle O'Reilly, the deceased editor of the Catholic Pilot. They reprobate him as a "determined enemy of the public schools."

CARDINAL LAVIGERIE'S address to the Anti-slavery Congress claimed for the church the initiation of the emancipation of slaves in the Roman empire, in defiance of the fact that the emancipatory movement had been growing for generations before the church's birth.

A BAND of students visiting Rome, on being denied entry to the Vatican museums and galleries by the gate which they thought the most proper one, raised an uproar, and cried, "Hurrah for King Humbert! Hurrah for Italy! Down with the Vatican! Death to the pope!"

THE Catholics of New Mexico, under the generalship of Jesuits, hav voted down the constitution under which that territory was to enter on statehood, their objection being to its provision of public in place of their parochial schools. This keeps New Mexico out of the Union for the present.

THE comte de Paris, the monarchist aspirant to the sovereignty of France, was received by the customs collector of the New York port in the name of the president. It was suggested that the French legation at Washington might protest, and the president accordingly declined to giv the count official reception.

JOHN SWINTON, the labor agitator, was given a reception by three thousand workingmen on his return from Europe. He says that labor revolution is imminent in all the great nations. In England and Scotland it will, he says, be peaceful unless the army or Bank of England or Windsor Castle try to stop it.

DAVID SPIETH BATHSHEBA.

And it came to pass in an evening-tide, that David arose from off his bed, and walked upon the roof of the king's house: and from the roof he saw a woman washing herself; and the woman was very beautiful to look upon.—2 Sam. xi, 2.

Gems of Thought.

WHERE is the "unexplored land" but in our own untried enterprises? To an adventurous spirit any place—London, New York, Worcester, or his own yard—is "unexplored land," to seek which Fremont and Kane travel so far. To a sluggish and defeated spirit even the Great Basin and the Polaris are trivial places. If they can get there (and, indeed, they are there now), they will want to sleep, and giv it up, just as they always do. These are the regions of the Known and of the Unknown. What is the use of going right over the old track again? There is an adder in the path which your own feet hav worn. You must make tracks into the Unknown. That is what you hav your board and clothes for. Why do you ever mend your clothes, unless that, wearing them, you may mend your ways? Let us sing! . . . Do not engage to find things as you think they are. Do what nobody else can do for you. Omit to do anything else.—Thoreau.

SURELY there is grandeur in knowing that in the realm of thought, at least, you are without a chain; that you hav the right to explore all hights and all depths.—Ingersoll.

IF the bodies of animals are evolved, their minds must be evolved likewise. Herbert Spencer and his followers hav been mainly instrumental in elucidating this aspect of the case. They hav shown, or they hav tried to show (for I don't want to dogmatize on the subject), how mind is gradually built up from the simplest raw elements of sense and feeling; how emotions and intellect slowly arise; how the action of the environment on the organism begets a nervous system of ever greater and greater complexity, culminating at last in the brain of a Newton, a Shakspere, or a Mendelssohn. Step by step, nerves hav built themselvs up out of the soft tissues as channels of communication between part and part. Sense-organs of extreme simplicity hav first been formed on the outside of the body, where it comes most into contact with external nature. Use and want hav fashioned them through long ages into organs of taste and smell and touch; pigment spots, sensitiv to light or shade, hav grown by infinit gradations into the human eye; tremulous nerve-ends, responsiv sympathetically to waves of sound, hav turned themselvs at last into a perfect gamut in the developed ear of men and mammals. Meanwhile corresponding percipient centers hav grown up in the brain, so that the colored picture flashed by an external scene upon the eye is telegraphed from the sensitiv mirror of the retina, through the many-stranded cable of the optic nerve, straight up to the appropriate headquarters in the thinking brain. Stage by stage the continuous process has gone on unceasingly, from the jelly-fish with its tiny black specks of eyes, through infinit steps of progression, induced by ever-widening intercourse with the outer world, to the final outcome in the senses and the emotions, the intellect and the will, of civilized man. Mind begins as a vague consciousness of touch or pressure on the part of some primitiv, shapeless, soft creature; it ends as an organized and co-ordinated reflection of the entire physical and psychical universe on the part of a great cosmical philosopher.—Home Journal.

BY the doctrin of Filiation, or Descent [Evolution], we are enabled for the first time to reduce all organic phenomena to a single law, and to discover a single activ cause for the infinitly intricate mechanism of the whole of this rich world of phenomena. In this respect, Darwin's theory stands quite on a level with Newton's theory of Gravitation; indeed, it even rises higher than Newton's theory!—Haeckel.

THE calamities with which the world is afflicted, are the result of the ignorance of men, and not of the interference of God.—Buckle.

PAIN and destruction are not the deliberate acts of a wrathful or chastening God, who consciously sends them with reference to their immediate effects; but they are the necessary results of an eternal succession of causes. And we do not need to propitiate the deity that he may not send such calamities, but we need to increase our knowledge of these operations of nature, that, by coming into harmony with their workings, we may avoid their evil results.—Robt. C. Adams.

Notes and Clippings.

A PREACHER and a judge returning from the Methodist camp-meeting at Pacific Grove near San Francisco were recently heard discussing the question, under secret advisement among the leaders of the sect, of uniting forces with the Catholics in order to more easily secure such legislation as might be desired by both Protestant and Catholic churches.

BECAUSE a Buffalo, N. Y., father and mother endeavored to take their daughter away from a convent in Rochester, into which she had been enticed and deludedly insisted upon remaining, the Catholic Journal, published in that town, says they "deserve a term in prison." The assertion would hav been nearer the truth had they failed to make the effort.

A WRITER in the Catholic Monitor thus deplores the departure of the good old days: "Every nation, no matter how deeply sunk in barbarity, hav [has] considered worship of absolute need. All things else were secondary to it. Refusing to worship was punishable by death. Were such stringent laws enacted in our days, there would be few indifferentists and fewer Infidels."

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, on a Wagner night at the Madison Square Garden, is a picture of content and serenity which a Sun writer declares cannot be described. The colonel has just pitched into Tolstoi and called him a barbarian because he decries music. Colonel Ingersoll, at one of these concerts, sits with his back to the orchestra. His head is thrown up, and he seems to be taking great quaffs of the melody. He seems to think that the music sounds a great deal better if he does not see the performers, and a good many people are disposed to agree with him.

THE officers of the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, who refused the hall to Colonel Ingersoll for his lecture on "Art and Morality," which he was to giv for the benefit of Walt Whitman, on the ground that the lecturer was an "Infidel," are, says the Boston Globe, just the sort of bigots who would hav burnt him at the stake in Calvin's day on some small metaphysical misunderstanding in theology.

THE Kansas City Times is politically opposed to Senator J. J. Ingalls, so it says: "Christianity and morality are insulted by the presence of John J. Ingalls in the chair of the nation's incompetent vice-president. He has directed the jet of his poisonous sneers against the Bible, the decalog, and the Golden Rule; he has said that the civilized world has worn out its Christ and needs a new one; he has laughed in his sleeve at his own politics and changed his opinions as often as there was anything to make."

THE San Francisco Freethought thinks that the directors of the American Baseball Association should be encouraged. At a recent meeting they decided to sustain the umpires in all the fines imposed for umpiring Sunday games, and to take up the fight of the Rochester club and push the matter through the courts. In San Francisco there is no restriction on Sunday amusements. As a result thousands of boys and young men spend the day on the baseball grounds instead of, as in Eastern cities, in saloons and pool-rooms.

THE Christian Register thus philosophizes: "Nature is both conservativ and progressiv. She holds to old customs which she likes, but she is not at all ashamed to change her forms. Indeed, she is constantly doing so. If Barnum could furnish us with a menagerie of the pre-glacial period, it would be a very singular collection of animals. If we compared them with those of our own day, we should be surprised to find how the fashion in animals has changed. The same would be true of a comparativ ancient and modern botanical show. Nature has left many of her fashion plates in the rocks, and from them we can see a good many of the old clothes she has cast off. They served their day and generation: they do not belong to ours. If the old lizards, fishes, and monsters of the past were to rise from their stony graves, we should hav to repeat the work of the original Nimrods of the race and drive them back to their tombs again. Indeed, in some quarters of the globe, the first thing that is necessary to be done for civilization is to kill and bury the wild animals which belong to a past age, but which do not belong to ours. So, in the mental and moral evolution of man, he must bury a good many of the old barbaric creeds and forms of the past which he has clearly outgrown. There are mastodons and pterodactyls in theology and mythology which ought to be banished from modern thought as their material prototypes hav been banished from modern life. On the other hand, if there is anything in the old forms still fitted to survive, as colossal and intelligent, for instance, as a well-trained elephant, and therefore still of use to humanity, let us by all means keep it alive."

AT the Baptist ministers' conference the Rev. Dr. Robert Bruce Hull spoke of his recent visit to Palestine. To Dr. Talmage the speaker applied the saying: "It is better not to know so many things than to know so many that are not so." "In one of Mr. Talmage's sermons," he said, "occurs the sentence, 'The road from Joppa to Jerusalem and all the roads leading to Nazareth and Galilee we saw lined with processions of Jews going to the sacred places, either on holy pilgrimages or as settlers.' The preacher of the sermon must hav had good eyes. Nobody else saw them, I am sure. As a fact, that is not so. Of course, it is the reporter who must hav made the mistake. There is no crowd of Jews there. It is true they are coming in, but they are few in numbers, and they are the poorer Jews for whom Rothschild and Montefiore hav there built houses. Another mistake in the sermon is where mention is made that all through the journey in Palestine fire-arms are required. He says: 'While the only weapon I had on my person was a New Testament, we went through the region, where I said to the dragoman, "David, are you armed?" and he said, "Yes;" and I said, "Are these fifteen or twenty muleteers and baggagemen and attendants armed?" and he said "Yes," and I felt safer.' He might hav required arms, but we did not. Not a muleteer in Palestine carries an arm. There is not one that needs one. The dragoman wears a belt in which he carries a pistol, but it is not for use so much as it is a badge of office, like a policeman's club. Not a muleteer is armed on the west side of Jordan. It is different on the east side, but there no traveler goes."

Christian Morality.

It is the belief of the majority of Christians that they, by divine right presumably, hav the sole monopoly of morality.

They cannot see how the life of a non-Christian can be pure unless he believes in vicarious atonement—a most immoral belief—and in Jahveh, and has wept his way from the "mourner's bench" to the great white throne of grace.

"We are pure as the driven snow, for the blood of Jesus Christ hath cleansed us from all sin, but ye are not, nor can ye be until you are converted to our faith," is the cry of those latter-day Pharisees.

Not only do they claim that purity of life for themselvs, but even they, in their ignorance, will often refer one to the fathers for evidence as to the purity of Christianity in its childhood.

They say, and verily it is a truism that holds good in most cases, that the nearer the fountain-head the purer the spring, yet the farther one travels up this river of Christianity the filthier becomes the stream, until when one does arrive at its head the stench is so overpowering that one gladly seeks relief in other, less divine, pastures.

In the present paper I intend bringing before the public specimens of "Christian morality," taken from various Christian writers.

In reading the life of Christ in the New Testament I cannot help remarking the unnatural manner in which Jesus oft spoke to his mother. At the marriage supper at Cana when Mary told his Lordship of the dearth of wine in the house, he turned to her with the contemptuous remark, "Woman, what hav I to do with thee?" which if made by a modern son to his mother would almost freeze the blood in her veins.

In the mouth of a God the above may sound natural, but if made by any person civilized, it would appear very unfilial.

Then, at the crucifixion, when the mother's heart was yearning toward her son, the only comfort he could giv her was prefaced by the same word, "woman."

He could not, even in his dying hour, call her mother, that most tender, sweet, and loving of all names, the name which even the most hardened ruffian pronounces with reverence, and which, had it been whispered by that almighty fiend, Jahveh, would almost hav made him human—no, the only balm he could pour into her broken heart commenced with, 'woman."

No wonder the Jews denounced his religion. For the man who can speak harshly to or of his mother deserves to be thrust out of the pale of society.

"Honor thy father and thy mother," and liv an envied life.

Then what a mighty example of morality is offered by the life of St. Simon Stylites, a worthy father of our most holy Roman church. What humility of spirit was it that enabled his saintship to mount a pillar, and, with right arm extended toward heaven, hand clenched, remain there, unwashed, a number of years, a monument of holiness and filth. He kept his arm extended so long that, as Kingsley tells us, it stiffened in that upright position, the nails of his fingers growing through the back of his hands, in order that God might be glorified the more. Mr. Stylites had, of course, a horde of imitators who served God in the same way. They thought that by mortifying the flesh their claim on their heavenly mansion was proved.

Much the same thought occurs to the Roman Catholic of to-day who crawls upon his hands and knees over a pebbly road to a holy station or wears a hair garment next his skin. What idiocy and puerility must be in the brain of a man who stoops to such degrading rites! Yet the record of early Christianity is one long series of filthy, idiotical, and bloody actions. Were a father of the church to appear at St. Anne's, New York, I hardly think that Archbishop Mike would receive him with anything approaching to reverence. At least the water with which Michael would wash the feet of the "father" could profitably be highly seasoned with lye.

Wandering down through the ages we come to the time when the "mysteries" or sacred plays were acted. In those we can recognize the moral tone of Christianity, especially in that one acted in England some two hundred years ago, in which the third chapter of Genesis was acted ad vitum before a numerous assemblage of both sexes (Disraeli's Curiosities of Literature, vol. iii). Comment is useless.

As regards the clergy, they were even worse than their plays. Robertson, in his "History of Charles V.," tells us that the monasteries were no better than brothels. Priests lived openly in their shame. On week-days they led their flock in their downward career, and on Sundays unblushingly directed their attention to heaven, while they, the priests, were concocting some plan to steal their wives and daughters. From pope to novitiate all were fearfully immoral. When the life of Luther was purity itself compared with that of Roman Catholics of that day one can imagin the depth to which those Christians had sunk in their licentiousness.

Cardinal Bellarmin said "that if the pope commanded the practice of vice instead of virtue the church would hav to obey." Indeed, it would seem as if such an order did really emanate from the Vatican, to judge by the lives of the Catholic clergy of that period.

Under the empire it was common to see the clergy of France going to the chapel with prayer and betting books under arm ready for the afternoon's sport. Truly a fine example to their flock of well-named sheep.

And when in Malta, a few years ago, I never was so much astonished as at the tales that were told me of the monks whose lives we suppose are spent in contemplation of God's goodness, but who, according to a trustworthy Maltese with whom I was acquainted, spend them in an entirely different manner. They are, and hav always been in all times and countries, a living reproach to civilization, and one wonders how the people, by whom they exist, suffer them to remain as drones in the world's hive.

But it is ever so, men are not so happy as when they are slaves and fools kissing the iron hand that crushes them down! O that the people would understand the nature of this vile superstition; would only arise from their groveling attitude and stand free and independent, guided by their own intelligence, as an honest God would hav them do. I often think that, if there be a God, he will hate nothing more than to see mankind wallowing in the direst superstition.

I could fill pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER with facts affecting Christian morality, but the above, I think, will serve to show that, instead of being the most moral, it is one of the most immoral of any so-called divine religions.

If impurity were an evidence of divine origin, I should undoubtedly say that its divinity was proved, and that, since its supernatural origin is asserted, he must hav been a "past redemption" God indeed who could hav created such a monster. But like produces like. Jack is no better than his master, and the clergy, according to the newspapers of to-day, do not care to be any better than that lecherous, Jewish God who spent his early days, at least the earliest we know of, in directing his favorits where to find their concubines.

Bah! down with this Christianity, this murderess of biensèance, whose once dark robe is crimsoned with the blood of her victims—with that hoary-headed tyrant, misnamed God, whose sole delight is in the immolation of his children on his bloody altar—and from their ruins let arise the pale, yet beautiful figure of Freethought flooding the world with the light of its knowledge, making ignorance an impossibility.

WILLIAM ROBERTSON.

Hypnotic Religion.

The astounding revelations about the new Christ and his "heaven" in the southern part of Winnebago county, Illinois, hav doubtless raised a question in many minds as to what could be the influence used by Schweinfurth in accomplishing his designs. Those who hav kept themselvs informed as to the discoveries of the great French physicians in mesmerism, or, as it is now called, "the science of hypnotism," made within the last two or three years, will hav no difficulty in agreeing with me that that is the influence. For the benefit of those who are not posted on this subject I will state some of the wonderful results which these physicians hav accomplished by actual experiment.

Dr. Charcot made his hypnotized subject see his portrait on a sheet of blank paper, and for days afterward she could distinctly see the portrait and showed her friends what a fine likeness it was.

Professors Binet and Féré made a subject believe that on awaking she would not see Féré, which was actually the case, and they performed many curious and amusing experiments with her, such as putting a hat on his head, which she declared was suspended in the air; putting an overcoat on him, which she said looked as if it was on a hollow dummy, etc.; and they found that such suggestions if not removed would last for days and even months. In the same way they could make her deaf to the voice of a particular person.

Professor Bernheim ascertained that he could make his subject commit murder or larceny or any other crime, and pass through an apparent trial before a supposed magistrate, in which he would declare that he committed the crimes of his own free will. The professor says: "Illusions can be induced instantaneously. I can produce uni- or bi-lateral blindness; he may be made to see with only one eye. A pin or a light held close to the other eye does not make him wink. I can produce the various hallucinations of sight. I invoke visions of people he has known. I show him his son whom he has not seen for eight years. He recognizes him and tears flow from his eyes. I make him swallow salt for sugar. He thinks it sweet. I put a pencil in his mouth, saying it is a cigar. He blows out puffs of imaginary smoke," etc.

Suffice it to say that hypnotizers can at will produce any conceivable illusion, and that the subject will vividly remember it when awake as an actual reality, if told to do so, otherwise he will hav no recollection of it whatever.

He may also be told that at a particular time in the future he is to do a certain thing, but is not to remember that it was suggested to him to do it. In the mean time he will hav no recollection of it, but when the time comes round he will be seized with an uncontrolable impulse to do that thing, and will do it if possible, and if examined under oath will honestly swear that he did it of his own free will. Of course a woman is absolutely at the mercy of her hypnotizer. He may paralyze her so as to render her incapable of resistance, or he may make her believe she is with her husband or lover, or, for that matter, with the "Holy Ghost."

There is no difficulty in making a hypnotized person giv up money, or execute a deed, note, or other instrument in writing, for he may be made to believe that the transaction is one greatly to his benefit, or a suggestion may be impressed upon him that he is to execute and deliver such papers at a future day, which he will comply with, forgetting the suggestion and thinking he is acting of his own volition. The hypnotist can also instantly change the belief of his subject. If he is a skeptic, he can make him profoundly religious, or, if religious, can make him a rampant skeptic. If he is a drunkard, an opium smoker, a devotee of morphine, chloral, or any other drug, he can make him loathe the very thought of it. Such changes will, however, usually wear off in a few days unless renewed, consequently these physicians hav found by experience that it is necessary to renew the influence about twice a week for several months, until new habits are formed which are permanent.

Hypnotism has been found to be a wonderful curativ agent, and has, for several years past, been extensivly used for that purpose in the great French hospitals. Its most striking cures are obtained in complaints of a nervous character, such as insanity, hypochondria, epilepsy, paralysis, etc., but surprising results are obtained in other diseases. For example, the effects of emetics, cathartics, opium, and other medicins, may be obtained by simple suggestion, without giving them to the patient at all. Besides, it is usually putting a patient a long way on the road toward recovery when you can make him feel absolutely sure that he is, in fact, getting well. This the hypnotist can do par excellence.

There are many methods of putting people in the hypnotic state. Some persons naturally hav extraordinary hypnotic power, while others are unusually sensitiv to the influence; under such circumstances, a steady gaze is frequently sufficient. It used to be supposed that only about one person in ten was susceptible of being hypnotized, but lately Dr. Luys, of La Charite Hospital in Paris, has discovered that a little revolving mirror, used by French peasants in charming birds, can also be used to hypnotize human beings. Here is what he says of it: "The advantage of my system is, that by means of it, one single operator can fascinate, at one and the same time, an unlimited number of patients without trouble to himself, and with no loss of force. It has also the advantage of absolute infallibility. I hav never known it to fail, etc." (For a more complete account of this method, see Scientific American supplement for June 28, 1890.)

The limits of an article of this kind preclude anything but the briefest synopsis of so extensiv a subject as hypnotism. Those who wish to pursue it further are referred to the writings of Mesmer, Dr. William B. Carpenter, Dr. James Braid, Drs. Charcot, Binnet, Féré, and Luys, of the Paris school; Profs. Bernheim and Liebault, of Nancy; an article by Dr. Charcot in the Forum for April, 1890, and particularly to an article in the Overland Monthly for July, 1890.

Now, assuming that Schweinfurth is a powerful and accomplished hypnotist, how easy would it be for him to acquire hypnotic control over the members of his "church" during the intimacies incident to revival and other religious excitement, and that, too, without their being aware of the fact. The oftener this control was exercised the easier would be its accomplishment till a mere glance would be sufficient. This once accomplished and all the rest follows almost without an effort. He could convince them beyond a doubt that he was the risen Christ. He could giv them beatific and heavenly visions to their heart's content. He could cure them of many of their ailments in a, to them, miraculous manner. He could make them think that it was their duty to deed or donate their property to him, and to come and work for him for the good of the cause and liv in his "heaven," where he would hav exclusiv control over them, with no one to interfere. And the women, how easy to make them believe while hypnotized that they were "overshadowed by the Holy Ghost," as one of them testified, and that the result would be an "immaculate conception."

What surprises me is that he has no better sense than to make them testify to such nonsense, knowing, as he must, what a storm of sarcasm and obloquy it will bring upon his church and himself, and the legal and illegal difficulties it will get them into, when he might hav just as easily convinced them that their intercourse had been with some of the male members of the church.

About thirty years ago I was present at a high-pressure revival of religion, the proceedings of which I closely watched, and I came to the conclusion that what they called "the spirit of the Lord" on that occasion was mesmeric (as it was then called) in its nature, an opinion I hav never changed. Great revivalists are in reality hypnotists of extraordinary power. At some future time I may giv my reasons for this belief.

In the mean time I will bring this article to a close by saying that I am convinced that hypnotism will be found to explain most, if not all, of the peculiar phenomena of voodooism; the witchcraft, magic, and devilish possession of the ancients; spiritualistic wonders, particularly the materialization of spirits; mind cure, faith cure, et id genus omne.

C. G. STAFFORD.

The Exact Science.

Slowly, but surely, science is drifting into the realm of pure mathematics. Of all the sciences astronomy was the first to become a mathematical science. Mechanics soon followed, then those other branches of physics relating to optics and sound.

The mechanical equivalent of heat being discovered, thermodynamics became a mathematical science, and men like Maxwell and Thomson hav made electricity and magnetism mathematical. A branch of philosophy, known as molecular physics, is fast leading chemistry through the same gateway. Now we come to biology, the science of life, and it, too, must follow in the same wake. Actions that take place in organized bodies are each day being found to be chemical actions, and molecular physics is demonstrating the mathematics of chemical actions. The telescope sees afar off the masses of nebulæ whirled in spiral curves. The microscope reveals to us the currents in the protoplasm of a cell, currents whirling round and round, also in spiral curves. Philosophy teaches us the same great class of laws control the motions of the microscopic and the telescopic particles alike. That a million suns swing like one mass in their mighty orbit according to laws of motion, the counterpart of those that swing the protoplasmic particles within the tiny cell. Even if the cell in question be in the gray matter of a human brain, every motion in that cell is a resultant of the impressed force. While the currents of a thousand cells within a human brain describe their curves, a man may think, may act, may will or move. Yet, when he does these things, he says that he is the master-mover of them all. Within himself he claims to hav an ego that he can wish or pray to, and the ego will respond and answer wish or prayer.

Some men believe that prayer sincere enough could swing the planets from their destined paths; but others go less far, admitting that their wishes cannot influence celestial spheres, yet claim that within them there is an ego that can act by will independent of and over actions that are occurring within themselvs. They feel that they can or cannot at choice act in certain ways, yet feeling has been proved a thousand times to be an uncertain guide to fact.

Is then our thought and action wholly due to structure and the balancing of parts composing us? Or is a man to even a very limited extent the master of even a part of himself?

Answering the first question in the affirmativ, we admit the universality and absolutism of natural law. If we answer it in the negativ we deny these. Rarely do Liberals discuss these questions. Perhaps this is because it is so difficult to frame an argument against this absolutism of the ego which does not contain a technical absurdity that will cause a writer to be caught in a trap of his own words.

Still, as physics is throughout mathematical, and as chemistry through physics is becoming mathematical and biology is being proved to be a mass of chemical phenomena, is not the question of the absolutism of the ego asking us more loudly every day, Does natural law fail to be absolute where the ego begins?

We all hav a tender regard for that little ego. Many would make us believe that all of nature was made for its special benefit.

But as we notice the advance of science and comprehend a wider nature the ego has to take a back seat. Of course this is very mortifying to the ego at first, but history furnishes a few parallel examples. Thus the Jews once thought themselvs God's chosen people, but they were not. Bible science said that the sun, moon, and stars were made for the sake of man on the earth; moreover, the earth thrown in, for man, too. This is now considered altogether too flattering to man. Just as though the sun had no better business than to accommodate man? Just as though the earth is flying at the rate of sixty-eight thousand miles per hour around the sun simply to giv man a ride! Man's biggishness has been muchly diminished in the last two thousand years, and it looks as though the limit to which it is converging is zero. What a come-down! Fable says, and men believed, that man was copied from Mr. Most High, chief engineer of a machine called the universe, that runs on perfect mathematical principles, where an engineer would hav nothing to do except to do nothing.

Now, a personage busily employed in doing nothing for so long a time as forever, would atrophy by natural causes. Thus before a forever was over with nature's chief engineer must hav converged to zero a forever ago. Thus if the ego is an image of Mr. Most High, quite naturally, as the equal of zero is zero, there must be to nature relativly as much God as there is to man absolute ego.

Also, if the gray cells of a man's brain hav over them an extra-physical boss, is it not quite as reasonable to suppose that over nature there may be a supernatural boss?

Here is a harmony that would please the Christian nicely. Call the ego the super-cerebral; call the Lord the supernatural; what the super-cerebral cannot do the supernatural can, and nature gets left out in the cold, but even then man cannot find an absolute zero of temperature. Neither can he find an absolute zero of potential. In fact, he is unable to find an absolute anything, except it be the everything. He can assume ten thousand things, and find their relativs. Thus, why should he not assume an ego; assume further that the ego is absolute, and then determin relativ relations? Poor man, he has sunk from being a God's pet to a being on a dead level with nature. There he should remain; he is matter, constructed, to be sure, but relativ to nature of not one whit more account than an equal weight of sawdust.

The Death Penalty.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 20th appears an article the subject of which has often occupied my mind, the death penalty.

For nearly forty years I hav held the opinion that the death penalty is a cruel wrong and ought to be abolished. Yet, when I see the workings of our present criminal law I find it would be still more cruel to abolish it. Here in California, where murders are committed perhaps oftener than in any other state, murderers are usually leniently dealt with. They are mostly sent to the penitentiary, pardoned by the governor, and invariably commit new crimes as soon as they are out. Under these circumstances it is due to society to hang the murderers to prevent them from doing further harm, and mobs are justifiable in lynching criminals; for people must protect themselvs when the government will not protect them.

Every human being is born with certain instincts, that is to say, they hav certain desires or inclinations for certain pursuits which develop themselvs without tuition. These instincts are the accumulated experiences and inclinations of our ancestors transferred to their offspring, and we are in no way responsible for them. These inborn tendencies will degenerate or be improved upon according to the circumstances with which we are surrounded; and since our surroundings are often forced upon us, and not our own choice, it follows that, to a great extent, we are not responsible for our actions. Some people are born mechanics, some mathematicians, and some are born thieves and some murderers. Why then should we punish people for what they cannot help? It is cruel, it is barbarous.

It is true, society must protect itself by restraining the criminals, but in our present uncivilized society we punish the criminals according to the magnitude of the offense they hav committed, while, if we were enlightened or truly civilized, we would treat them as moral patients and not punish them at all, since they are the victims of circumstances as much as the most moral people among us.

Society ought to be protected from criminals a great deal more than it now is. Criminals ought to be confined and treated as moral patients, and not released until they hav completely recovered. And since their dispositions are invariably inherited by their children, they ought not to be allowed to marry or propagate children and perpetuate moral disease. But in their confinement they ought to be treated kindly, and force ought to be resorted to only when unavoidable.

All punishments are barbarous. Evil-doers must be restrained, but the restrainment ought to be looked upon by the party restraining and by the evil-doer as a necessary precaution against evil actions. To send a person to the penitentiary for a term of years is as ridiculous as to send a person to the hospital for a certain time on account of having a leg broken, and for a lesser time on account of having a finger jammed. When people are physically sick they are cared for until they are well; why do we not care for those who are morally sick and unfit to liv in society?

All criminals ought to be obliged to work and to earn their own living, and if they hav earned more than their living and care amounts to, the surplus ought to be paid to them on leaving the place of restrainment. But in no instance ought the people to be taxed to support a criminal who is able to earn his own living. To giv criminals money on leaving the penitentiary, as Mr. Ingersoll proposes, would prove a burden to the public and be no benefit to the criminal, for in nine hundred and ninety-nine cases out of a thousand they would spend the money in the first twenty-four hours. The experiment is not worth trying. Punishment hardens criminals, but does not reform them, and in nearly all cases the criminal leaves the penitentiary a greater villain than when he entered it.

Our penal system ought to be reformed, but until that is done it is not safe to send a murderer to the penitentiary. Barbarous and useless as a deterring agent as capital punishment may be, it has that in its favor that it prevents the murderer from committing further crimes.

Some may ask here, what shall be done with men like Harman and Heywood? Such men never ought to be molested, as they are not criminals. They may be guilty of folly, but not of crime. Where no one is injured no crime is committed, and, so far as I know, they hav never injured anyone. If they use language in print which the majority of people do not approve, it is a matter between them and the subscribers to their papers, and does not concern anybody else, unless they force their publications on somebody who does not want them. When will people of these United States get sense enough to abolish Comstockism?

"Because you are so old."—Voice.

NEW facts were discovered and therefore a new system of interpretation was required, and men began to apply their critical powers to the sacred writings for the purpose of bringing them into conformity with opinions that had been arrived at independently by the reason. Each new discovery of science that bore upon any scriptural question, each new order of tendencies evoked by the advance of civilization, produced a repetition of the same process.—Lecky.

The American Secular Union Congress.

In regard to railroad fares to the Portsmouth Congress we would ask our friends to note specially what we giv below.

As mentioned, the Eastern, Central, and Southern lines (the Western Passenger Association has declined to enter the pool) will grant us a reduction of two-thirds the regular first-class fare on our homeward tickets, provided we comply with the following conditions:

1. Each person desiring the reduction must purchase a first-class ticket to Portsmouth, O., for which he will pay the regular fare; and upon receipt the ticket agent will, at the time he buys the ticket, giv him a printed certificate of purchase, properly filled out and signed by said ticket agent.

2. If through tickets cannot be procured at the starting-point, the traveler must purchase to the most convenient point where through tickets can be obtained, and repurchase through to Portsmouth, requesting a certificate from the ticket agent at the point where repurchase is made

3. Tickets for the return journey will be sold, by the ticket agent at Portsmouth, O., at one-third the highest limited fare, only to those holding certificates (referred to above) signed by the ticket agent at the point where through ticket to Portsmouth was purchased, and countersigned by Ida C. Craddock, secretary of the American Secular Union, certifying that the holder has been in regular attendance at the Portsmouth Congress.

4. It is absolutely necessary that such a certificate be procured by each traveler, as it proves that full fare has been paid for the journey to Portsmouth, and that the purchaser is therefore entitled to the excursion fare returning. It will also determin the route via which the ticket for the return journey should be issued.

5. On some of the roads, tickets for return journey will be furnished only on certificates procured not more than three days before the meeting assembles, nor later than three days after the commencement of the meeting, and will be available for continuous passage only; no stop-over privileges being allowed on tickets sold at less than full fares. Certificates will not be honored unless presented within three days after the date of the adjournment of the Congress.

6. Ticket agents will be instructed that the excursion fares will not be available unless the holders of certificates are properly identified, as above described, by Ida C. Craddock, secretary of the American Secular Union, on the certificate.

7. These certificates are not transferable.

8. The reduction on return journey will apply only to the point at which a traveler's through ticket was purchased to Portsmouth on his way to the Congress.

9. (Very important.) NO REFUND OF FARE WILL BE MADE ON ANY ACCOUNT WHATEVER BECAUSE OF FAILURE ON YOUR PART TO OBTAIN A CERTIFICATE. Should you neglect to obtain a certificate as the above conditions provide, you will be obliged to pay full fare both ways.

10. Last, but not least, it is recommended that those who wish to obtain certificates shall arrange to be at the ticket office a half-hour before trains start, in order to receive proper attention from the ticket agent.

From Philadelphia, the Chesapeake and Ohio railroad (leaving Broad street station) giv us a rate of $15 50 first-class fare to Portsmouth, and one-third returning, which will bring the amount of round-trip ticket within $21. From New York city, the fare will be $16 going to Portsmouth, and one-third returning; and those of our friends who start from New York are requested to call at the office of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Co., 362 Broadway, to procure tickets.

Friends starting from Boston can leave at 9:15 A.M., via Shore Line, arriving at Philadelphia, Broad street station, at 6:47 P.M. There they can join the friends who may be en route from New York at that time, and leave Philadelphia from that depot at 7:40 P.M., reaching Portsmouth next day at 2:30 P.M. Tickets may be obtained at the Pennsylvania railroad office, 205 Washington street, Boston, and by procuring certificates (as directed above) signed by the ticket agent from whom they purchase their tickets through to Portsmouth, and having those tickets countersigned by Ida C. Craddock, secretary of the American Secular Union, at the Congress, they can get the benefit of the reduced rate homeward. By taking the above train and route, a transfer through New York city of person and baggage is avoided.

Our friends will please bear in mind that, in order to secure the above reductions in fare, they must be certain to provide themselvs with duly signed and countersigned certificates, as given above. No stop-over tickets will be allowed for Philadelphia or other intermediate points. Friends desiring to remain over in Philadelphia, either going or returning, will hav to pay regular fare between New York and Philadelphia, and repurchase ticket on which reduction is to be allowed in Philadelphia.

A vestibule train leaves New York via Pennsylvania railroad at 5 P.M.; Philadelphia, 7:40 P.M.; Baltimore, 9:55 P.M.; Washington, 11:10 P.M.; and reaches Portsmouth at 2:30 P.M. next day. The usual extra charge is made for sleeping berths. From Philadelphia, the Pullman charge is $4 through for a double berth, or $2.50 to White Sulphur Springs, where travelers may change to comfortable day coaches for the rest of the way. Two persons may occupy a double berth without extra charge. Friends may either carry their own lunches, or procure meals in the dining-car at $1 per meal. This is the only train carrying a dining-car through between New York and Portsmouth without change. The entire train is heated with steam, and is lighted with electric lights, individual electric lamps being provided for any passenger who may desire one at his seat or in his berth. The road winds through some of the most picturesque scenery to be had anywhere among the Alleghanies. At 6:45 next morning, we arrive at White Sulphur Springs, that famous aristocratic resort of the "F. F. V.'s" (first families of Virginia), situated in an undulating valley surrounded by mountains. The medicinal virtues of these springs are world-renowned, and hav been known and tested since 1788. Further on, we come into the Greenbrier valley, where the picturesque stream which givs the valley its name flows tranquilly along over a bed of slate. At Kanawha Falls, which we reach about 10:30, the scenery is wild and rugged in the extreme. "The broad river," writes an eastbound traveler, "sweeps majestically down over the rocks, and on both sides of you tower verdure-clad walls that are broken here and there with frowning masses of rock. Past the Hawk's Nest, or under it, the train rushes, carrying you into the wild, rugged defiles made by the New river, as it cuts its narrow pathway through the solid rock. There is no wilder or more picturesque scenery in America than that along the banks of the little stream which goes roaring and plunging over its stony course many feet below you." Later on we enter the beautiful valley of the Ohio, with its alternating fertil farms and busy manufacturing towns, and at 2:30 in the afternoon we find ourselvs at Portsmouth.

While it would of course be desirable, as a matter of social pleasure, that all our friends journey to Portsmouth on the same train, it is not at all obligatory. They can go individually on whatever train suits them best, and still be entitled to the reduction, provided they comply with the conditions regarding certificates, given above. Coming home, it is hoped that as many as possible will return on the one train, so that we may hav a fraternal jubilation and a good time generally—as well as more leisure than is likely to obtain at the Congress for overflow discussions of ways and means of extending our work.

We trust that our friends everywhere, and especially to the north and east of Philadelphia, can manage to come this way, so that we can hav a pleasant social journey homeward.

IDA C. CRADDOCK, Corr. Sec. A. S. U.

The Mutual Aid Society.

The necessity for greater organization, for closer union, is becoming more and more apparent to Freethinkers everywhere. The idea that lasting, effectiv work can be accomplished in no other way is gaining ground. That Secular work has been done spasmodically and with only transient success is manifest. Much time, money, and energy has been wasted in these comparativly fruitless attempts. And, too, when in a community Freethinkers hav aroused themselvs to a sense of their wrongs, the movement for justice has been participated in only by the more bold, the more brave and outspoken, while by far the greater number hav remained inactiv through cowardice, fear of failure and loss of business, the jeers of Christian neighbors, and the innuendoes of the priesthood, thus often rendering ineffectual the convulsiv attempt. Not one in a hundred of the Liberals and Freethinkers throughout the country belong to any Freethought organization or society, and many of those who do are far from zealous in the cause. The work done by our Secular Union is of so small an amount as to be almost imperceptible to the great mass of Liberals. What they hav done the past year beyond the printing and distribution of a few pamphlets and tracts I do not know. Undoubtedly they can do but little; indeed, loosely as they are organized, their hands must be bound. The absence of financial and moral support, and the single and unaided efforts of the officers, must be productiv of little telling or lasting benefit. We must hav closer union, better and more thorough organization. The state organizations of Washington, Oregon, California, Texas, the local organizations all over the country, must unite, must be bound together in closer ties of union and fellowship, recognizing the American Secular Union as a head, and ready to coöperate and render aid in every possible way in any attempt made by it to secure freedom and justice, and crush tyranny and oppression.

Auxiliary to this compact American Secular Union army should be organized a Mutual Aid Society similar to the Masons, Odd Fellows, and other kindred fraternities. Freethinkers need it, they demand it. It should be organized as strong and as systematically and thoroughly as any of those referred to; nor should its initiation fees, dues, assessments, etc., be more than is absolutely necessary to an economical management. Because of its fraternal features, its material aid and secret work, its membership would soon quadruple, yes, exceed by a hundred fold, that of the more open and public Secular Union. Thousands would join who at heart are Freethinkers but who, through moral cowardice, through fear of loss to business and social position, would not join the American Secular Union. Thousands of others would join, mainly on account of the fraternal and insurance features, who, while liberal in their views on religious matters, are not Liberals and Freethinkers, but who, through association with Liberals, and the reading of Liberal literature which would undoubtedly be thrown in their way, would ultimately become Freethinkers and as zealous in the cause as any.

That the work of Liberals and Freethinkers in secularizing our government is political in its nature we all know, and we know also that the Mutual Aid Society must be non-partisan in its organization; still, to be of aid, to be a beneficial auxiliary to the American Secular Union, much of the work must be political in its nature. The members of the American Secular Union to secure the adoption of any of the Nine Demands must vote for and elect men for public office favorable to these demands; and that by organization, by united work and vote, such men can be elected, is more than probable. While the Masonic lodge is non-partisan it is an actual fact that at least fifty per cent of the political offices in our country are held by members of that fraternity. Their work is not done openly, but secretly. Masons attend caucuses, primaries, and nominating conventions and it is there that their work is done, and it is right there that Secularists must do their work, and not trust to an ineffectual, unavailing demand for right and justice, or for proper laws, from men chosen and elected by their avowed enemies.

That Liberals will not organize, will not recognize leadership—that each demands the fullest independence and the acceptance of his or her ism—is to me a nonsensical idea. When it is fairly presented to their view, I firmly believe that all possessing that grain of common sense of which Liberals so much boast, will recognize the necessity of organization on some broad platform, and that each will sink his or her ism out of sight and work for the common good.

That a grand, a noble work can be accomplished by Liberals, I hav not the least doubt; that results will flow from such organization that will surprise the most sanguin I also believe. Let our next Congress, now about to meet at Portsmouth, O., thoroughly canvass the matter. Let a live, energetic committee be appointed to get immediately to work, and let the new year of 1891 see the inauguration of the strongest and most aggressiv Liberal movement ever started in the world.

I would that circumstances would allow me to attend the Congress.

Bravo, Brothers Reynolds, Jamieson, Andres, Sister Craddock, and others, for your courageous, ringing, energetic words! Let all to them extend a hand and success will crown their and our efforts.

ROSSEAU HESS.

Our London Letter.

The church congress at Hull has just closed its labors, such as they were, and it is very questionable if any good will arise from the meeting, any more than in past years. As usual, there was a considerable divergence of opinion, which seems rather remarkable in a church claiming perfect unity of faith. The proceedings commenced by the introduction of two deputations, one from the Wesleyans and the other from the Hull Nonconformist Association, with addresses of welcome and assurances of brotherly love. Compliments were freely exchanged. The bishop of Durham informed the Nonconformists that, though recent inquiries into the origin of the sacred books had caused some distress, he felt sure that the final result of the most searching investigation would be to bring the facts of providence and inspiration into closer connection with human life. It is to be hoped the Nonconformists were able to understand this learned remark; it is a question if the ordinary lay mind could grasp its meaning, if it had any. When the question of the church's attitude toward strikes and wages disputes was brought up, the combatants waxed warm. A trades unionist leader considered that the church must be with the laborers in the forthcoming struggle, because her "divine master" was with them, but another pious churchman, speaking as an employer, failed to see what that had to do with it, evidently being of opinion that Christ, not being an employee himself, knew nothing about the matter, and if the church could not back up his side as it has hitherto done, it had better stand neutral. If not, he will, perhaps, withdraw his support, and smash up the concern, so the church had better look out. A parson claimed that the Church of England is the largest trades union in existence. Another one, with an eye to the future, thought it advisable to be on the side of the many, as doubtless they would gain the day, and the church could then come in and claim a good share of plunder, on the ground of its valuable assistance. One Christian capitalist brought up the old stock argument that poverty was caused chiefly through improvidence and drink, though he did not explain how the laborer, getting ten or twelve shillings per week, could support a family and get drunk every night on that large income. I wonder how much his own drink costs him. A Westminster vicar practically recommended his brother clergymen first of all to get hold of the workingmen, a thing that had not yet been accomplished, and that is not likely to be accomplished unless the workingman changes very considerably.

A lady speaker took a very gloomy view of the state of the church and its small influence. In her opinion immorality is increasing, intemperance is growing, especially amongst women, irreligion is gradually permeating the masses, the religious observance of Sunday is becoming obliterated, and Infidelity goes a step further than of old.

The dean of Rochester is greatly shocked at the prevalence of gambling and betting in all classes, although he defended raffles and bazars because they produce so much money for churches and schools, and if the church received a commission on all the money changing hands in every form of speculation, he would be as eager a champion for every description of gambling as he is now its avowed enemy. Archdeacon Farrar was very severe on the swindles and corruptions of trade, but as most fraudulent traders are religious men, he goes rather against his own interests in abusing his supporters.

The Congregational Union went over pretty much the same ground, but one shining light was of a totally different opinion as to future prospects from the lady who spoke so sorrowfully at the revival meetings. From the Congregationalist's point of view Christianity was spreading fast, the interference of ministers in political and social matters was warmly welcomed, hostility to the gospel had died out, Secularism had failed to charm and had lost what little influence it once had. From which one may gather that this gentleman has a very good situation, and calculates the creed he professes will last his time.

The sum and substance of the whole matter is, it seems, that a lot of parsons hav had a week's holiday at the people's expense, hav aired their crochets, humbugged the faithful, put their tongues in their cheeks, winked at one another, and gone for a further holiday or to their own homes as the case may be.

A curious letter appeared last week in one of the dailies from a writer signing himself "A Happy Curate," who was at the time of writing attending the Hull congress. He says the happiest life is that of a parson, and there is no doubt the life of a tolerably good-looking, unmarried, not too bashful, well-connected curate, with a private income, is a very good position to hold, but he must be a fool to advertise it and make everyone anxious to go into the business. J. D.

Life and Death.

In the South Kensington Museum, London, there is an immense collection of objects which, according to taste or knowledge, attract the attention of the multitudes who go there. Now, however much attention may be given to the curiosities which abound in that place, there is one that attracts and transfixes all classes of visitors, from princes of royal blood and peers of every realm to the costermonger and lower-grade laborer. This is an exhibit labeled, "The Representation of a Man Resolved into His Chemical Elements." There is a certain amount of water in our blood and tissues, there before you is a large glass vessel containing just so many gallons of water; another jar shows the exact quantity of carbon in us; smaller bottles contain the iron and phosphorus in the precise proportions necessary to our constitution, and these are surrounded by little vials which contain the remaining different elements too numerous to mention here, but which show the complexity of the human physical structure. There they lie upon a shelf ready for some magician gifted with the powers of life and death to wave his magic wand over the strange assortment of chemical forces and recreate a human being, endow him with life and make him walk the earth, experience all the vicissitudes of human existence, and die like one of us.

Now, what strikes the cultivated observer is the exact identity of these elements of our bodies with those which the spectroscope has revealed as existing in the sun, the stars, the nebulæ, the earth. The spectroscope, that marvelous instrument of modern science, will analyze the most distant star or find the slightest trace of poison in the human system. Through it the stars now write their autographic record on the pages of terrestrial science.

We hav, therefore, within our bodies samples of the most important elements of which the universe is composed, so that man has well been called by ancient philosophers a microcosm—that is, a model or epitome of the universe. The sun, that radiant orb which illumins the world, is our father—"Our father which art in heaven . . . giv us this day our daily bread"—a Christianized version of the old Parsee prayer to the sun. Yes, our magnificent luminary in the heavens is the father of us all, and the earth is our mother. The solar rays fructify the earth and cause it to bring forth the compounds of which our bodies are composed. The sun's heat and animal heat are the same. A blush on the cheek of a maiden, and the tints on the petals of a rose, are equally the chemical action of imprisoned sunbeams. All life is embodied sunshine, and death the natural agent which, sooner or later, lets the pent-up elements free to disperse in space; and then passing through nature's laboratory, they combine into other forms and reappear amid the world's phenomena of life and beauty.

One of the most remarkable facts of life is the continual change that all things undergo. Nothing is at rest. The atoms of our bodies are continually changing. New atoms are born, the old ones die and are cast off. If it were not so, we could not liv. Birth and death are continually taking place, not only around us, but within us. The sun, the air, food, and water supply us with fresh elements for the nutriment of the molecules—these minute particles of matter which compose our physical structure. So that our bodies are only forms through which a stream of matter is continually flowing. Oxygen, the great death-dealer, is constantly passing through every fiber of our being, consuming and destroying. Hunger is simply waste of the system caused by the action of oxygen. But if oxygen is continually destroying, the sun's rays are continually renewing and building up; they resupply the system with the elements necessary for its renewal, and bring forth life and beauty from the midst of destruction, death, and decay.

Death, that awful, mysterious bourne from which no traveler has ever returned to tell us what is beyond the grave. Everything that livs must die, for death is the penalty of life. The enlightened, whose minds hav been freed from superstition, do not dread death. They know there is no angry God to face; no eternal punishment to fear. There is naturally some shrinking at the thought of physical pangs and regrets at the thoughts of leaving those held dearest on earth. But the memory of a well-spent life must be the greatest of all consolations in the last, sad hour of human existence. Death is a refuge for the over-burdened, the weary, the forlorn, the despairing, those who hav been blown about by the adverse winds of fate. After all, death is only change, and nature's changes resemble dissolving views by which the lower is gradually merged into the higher. ADA CAMPBELL.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

The Freethinkers of Berlin are about to erect a crematory. So it is always. Mankind has to look to the Infidel for progress, and when success attends the undertaking the church steps in and claims it as her doing.

The prominent Swedish Freethinker Dr. Knut Wicksell has entered the ranks of the Swedish Freethought society. The doctor is a member, of several years' standing, of the Universal Freethought Association. The doctor will associate himself especially with the North Stockholm auxiliary society.

New societies hav been started in Stockholm and Eskilstuna by Mr. Lennstrand. But the activity of our friends is not confined to this; a Freethinkers' Song-book by Mr. Hellborg and an Annual by Mr. Viktor Lennstrand are to see the light of this winter. Yes, Freethought in Sweden has come to stay, and we congratulate our friends on their success.

The first of a series of meetings inaugurated by the Social-Democratic party of Germany, tending to a leaving of the state church in a body, if possible by all belonging to said party, took place October 13th in Joel's hall, Berlin. The meeting was attended by about fifteen hundred persons of both sexes. A Mr. Regelt, B.Th., took occasion to signify his disapproval of this step by saying: "If you organize for a war for mental liberty, then we [the powers that be] will likewise organize to defend Jesus Christ, our redeemer." The audience greeted this sentiment with a hearty laugh and sundry queries, which woke up the police present, who declared the meeting disbanded on account of the noise made.—Der Freiheit. A second mass-meeting called by Mr. Voghtherr was attended by over four thousand people.—Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt.

In Sweden things are beginning to look brighter. A former bitter enemy of the Freethought movement, the Rev. C. J. Eckman, has in an open letter to Dagens Nyheter taken stand for our brethren. He says the state has no right to interfere with speculativ opinions and that the Freethinkers hav as much right to publish their ideas as the Christians theirs.—Fritänkaren. The importance of this step of Mr. Eckman, who also is a member of the Swedish Rigsdag (congress), cannot be overestimated. For a voice in Rigsdagen of a prominent Christian in defense of Freethought will do more good than almost any number of Freethinkers in the same body.

There is trouble in Norway. Rev. Frans Brusen recently spoke fiercely from his pulpit in Our Savior's church in Christiania against the secular press in general and the Christiania Dagblad especially. He said that said paper was destructiv to true religion and dangerous to "defenseless hearts and to those not strong in the faith." The fact that writings from Ibsen, Björnson, Kielland, Dr. Olsen, and others, all of whom are Freethinkers, appear in said paper, explains the horror and fear of the reverend gentleman, whose harang had the usual result—an increased sale of the forbidden paper.

That the Roman Catholics of Germany are not asleep, and that the priests work their sheep for all they are worth, is evident. According to the Freireligiöses Sonntags-Blatt Germany is crowded with Catholic societies, the aggregate income of which is between three and four million marks. The most prominent societies are: Society of Holy Childhood, the members of which, over one million, remain children until twenty-one years of age, and which had in 1888 an income of 12,966 francs; the Africa Society of German Catholics, which has two hundred and fifty members and an annual income of 350,000 marks. The journals of these two societies are printed in editions aggregating 160,000 numbers. Of the several propaganda societies four had, in 1888, an aggregate income of 1,896,124 marks. The St. Canesius Society, working for the establishment of parochial schools, has one hundred and twenty members. But besides these partially clerical societies there are in Germany seven hundred and fifty mechanics' societies, with one hundred and fifty-two buildings and two hundred and fifty thousand members, and two hundred and fifty labor societies with a membership of sixty thousand. Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG gave a course of lectures at Albion, Ida. and organized a strong Secular Union, with the following officers: A. V. Caldwell, president; Andrew Burstrom, secretary, and Hugh Moon, treasurer.

MR. CHARLES WATTS's subject before the Manhattan Liberal Club in this city November 7th is, "Religion, With and Without Theology." We hope that all the Liberals of the city will attend to welcome Mr. Watts, whose voice has not been heard in Gotham for many months.

MR. L. K. WASHBURN announces that he will be at the Congress of the American Secular Union on October 31st, at Portsmouth, O., and would like to arrange for lectures in the vicinity of Portsmouth from November 3d to November 8th. For terms address him at the Investigator office.

A BRANCH of the American Secular Union was organized in Newark, N. J., on the 9th inst., the officers elected being: President, W. G. Mayo; vice-president, John R. Charlesworth; secretary, Cora Belle Flagg; treasurer, Frank Kieb, Sr.; secretary of finance, Mrs. J. G. Hunter. The reason for this new organization is that the old Newark Liberal League has been taken possession of by the Anarchists.

MISS ADA CAMPBELL will lecture for the Friendship Liberal League, of Philadelphia, at Industrial Hall, Broad and Wood streets, Sunday, October 26th. Subject, 2:30 P.M., "Sunday in the Light of Reason;" 7:30 P.M., "Truth versus Christianity." The secretary of the League asks all the Liberals of the city to attend, as it will be the only opportunity they will hav of hearing Miss Campbell. Mr. Charles Watts will lecture at the same place on November 9th, and of course the hall will be crowded.

MORALS exhibit as constant a development as intellect. It is one of the most familiar facts that there are certain virtues that are higher than others, and that many of these belong exclusivly to a highly developed civilization. Thus, that the love of truth is a virtue is a proposition which, stated simply, would hav been probably accepted with equal alacrity in any age; but if we examin the extent to which it is realized, we find a profound difference. We find that in an early period, while all the virtues of an uncompromising partisan are cordially recognized, the higher virtue, which binds men through a love of conscientious inquiry to endeavor to pursue an eclectic course when party and sectarian passions rage fiercely around them, is not only entirely unappreciated, but is almost impossible.—Lecky.

Man vs. God.

PILLSBURY'S PREDICAMENT.

And blood will continue to be lawful tender for liberty till tyrants temporal and despots spiritual shall learn and know that God made the human soul volcanic, and woe ever to him or them who dare uncap her fires.

The above explosion is the concluding sentence of Parker Pillsbury's otherwise lucid lecture on "God in the Federal Constitution, Man and Woman Out."

It is only to be explained as one of the inconsistencies of human nature that an objector to God in government should by his own book enthrone him in the constitution of mankind.

If God is to be recognized as the author of man, what is the matter with making him the authority in the state? Is God any worse in the Constitution of a nation than he is in the character of the population?

If God has made man volcanic, who knows but that one of the results will be to plump God into the Constitution, and the final throw be to fire God out of his own universe? If man would only once get God out of him, there might be some show for him to settle down in peace and pursue the even tenor of his way.

The trouble in politics is not so much God in the Constitution of the country, as it is theology in the blundering people. As long as God is supposed to be somebody big enough to boss around, and thought to hav a right to dictate from having created every thing, there can be no end to the assumptions and disruptions among the godly crew who each will hav his own idea of God's name, nature, and notions, and all despise and damn those who hav sense enough to leave God out of their account, and courage to say so.

One time I met Parker Pillsbury in a pseudo-lyceum, in Cleveland, O. I had raised the question, What is the authority of spirits? My gun was aimed at the claim that ghosts of one sort or other had a right to command material people. I could not hammer grammar enough into the whole Spiritualistic crowd to make them comprehend the linguistic function of that little word "of," they all the time persisting in rendering the query, "What is the authority for believing in spirits?" There was much jaw and small grist from several of the assembled seers, who, seeing they were getting the worst of it, called on the ancient Abolitionist to abolish my argument, which he proceeded not to do by saying he would not apply to me, because it would not be courteous, the Bible epigram, "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God." He undertook to explain, however, that it was foolish to say there is no God, because a negativ cannot be proved. He forgot that it needs no proof to establish the axiom, the same body cannot move in opposit directions at the same time, and could not perceive that if everything must hav a cause, therefore there could not hav been a first cause, which he sought to make out by the very syllogism that disproved it.

The pretense that a God operates among men, volcanically or otherwise, discounts, despises, and disfranchises as fools or knaves all who hold to another sort of boss spook or deny his godship altogether.

If there were a God, it would be necessary to abolish him. Voltaire's shade will take notice.

So long as the idea of God, one or more—that is to say, the notion of an unapproachable seat of irresponsible authority—predominates in the mind of men, so long will force be used to back up fraud, as cunning continues to conjure chains professed to be prophetically derived from the hollow court of fathomless lies—for the profit of the conjurer.

So long as terrestrial tribunals swear witnesses by the God instinct—which is all in their eye—so long will hypocrits and half-wits bear false witness against their neighbors; whilst if a religious test might be rationally permitted, it should be applied to exclude those from privilege who profess the vulgar faith.

So long as superstition's swindlers are imposed by spear and sword, so long will powder and bullet be needed in the stout hands of thinking men as essential means to make way for reason and justice in the earth.

When the sanctimonious scoundrels press the petty plea that they hav the right to believe and profess what they please, and therefore to claim the right to bear rule by royalty from God, the proper and pertinent reply is, that they hav no civil right to insist, nor should they be granted the over-generous privilege of either insisting on the inviolability of their own nescience nor of instigating or countenancing a conspiracy against a secular government on the earth, by the people of the earth, for the people of the earth.

When God is dead, beyond any hocus-pocus resurrection, or, in other words, when ghostly and godly superstition shall cease forever to intolerantly influence the mind of man, then it will be, and it will not be till then, that smiling peace and satiate plenty shall pervade plain and hill, because in that day of the people individual and collectiv justice shall invest home and forum as knowledge shall be gathered and diffused.

Then man shall be revered by man because of reverend manliness, and the home, sweet home, shall be the holy sanctuary of love, where sincere affection shall count it no sacrifice to offer the best to family and guest, not affinities sought for abroad.

Then men shall seek for truth and find it, because it is the mind's natural sustenance, and they will confer together because mutual assistance by mutual agreement is the only safe and sound policy, right not needing might for its friend. (Does Mrs. Severance catch on?)

When the allegiance of reason shall replace the worship of wind, and weary knees shall bend no more in profitless prayer at the altar of blind force—when scornful lips and sneering noses shall not breathe contempt for the Atheist assayer whose last analysis precipitates God to limbo—then, and then for certain, the halls of science shall be the temples of intelligence, and the lyceum floor of free discussion be our bloodless battle-field.

No Tornado Insurance.

One is not required to go outside the church for religious satire. In the peculiar activity known as church-work, the devoted Christian is often unconsciously inconsistent, and we may stand at a respectful distance and smile pityingly and derisivly. I strolled into one of Milwaukee's churches last Sunday after the congregation had left, and looked respectfully at some new interior decorations that the papers had spoken of. As I was passing out a piece of paper in one of the pews attracted my attention and I picked it up. It was one of those comical pronunciamentos which the blindly faithful, buffeted between dogmatic carelessness and worldly scheming, so often put forth. They love to consider the lilies and toil not on Sundays, but forget to take no care for the morrow on week-days. At the head of the paper, which was a begging letter, was the photographic-engraving reproduction of a wrecked church, and under it this appeal:

Plymouth church of Fargo, N. D., was completely destroyed by the storm on the morning of July 7th. It was a mission church in the north part of the city, having a large and important field and doing a splendid work. It has two flourishing Sunday-schools under its care. Our building is a total loss, as we had no tornado insurance upon it. In our present circumstances we are utterly unable to rebuild. Can you not giv us a helping hand? Send your gifts to Rev. E. H. Stickney, Fargo, N. D., treasurer of the building committee. Geo. S. Bascom, pastor. H. C. Simmons, supt. A. H. M. S. for North Dakota.

Is not this a rich one! No tornado insurance! Doubtless they thought their Lord would prosper and shield them in their "large and important field" and the "splendid work" their church was doing. In the confusion and despair of their wreck they overlook the implied distrust in divine aid shown by their letter, and show how much more practical they consider human aid. In the picture of the wrecked church, which they send out, is shown a dwelling-house also, and it is next door to the dilapidated "house of God." Is there any significance in the fact that the dwelling shows no signs of injury from the wind? FREDERIC HEATH.

An Interesting Book.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I took so much pleasure in reading Mrs. Colman's "Reminiscences," when contributed to your columns, that I am very glad to find them in so handsome a volume as that published by H. L. Green at Buffalo. Her accounts of the hostility of the church to the antislavery and woman's rights reforms, and of her own advocacy of these great movements as a lecturer, are extremely lively as well as instructiv. What she says about Spiritualism ought to be read by every Spiritualist, and especially her reason, given on page 31, for not giving more of the experience which has made her cease to believe in the "phenomena."

F. M. HOLLAND.

Are They Knaves or Idiots?

From Brick Pomeroy's Advance Thought.

The new society in this city for the suppression of vice, of which society Dr. Gunn is president, opens its exercises by a damnable outrage on the rights of others. Its agent, a man named Britton, as ordered by Dr. Gunn, swoops down upon several hundred books that he has not bought and has no right to, steals them by force away from their owner, and brings the accused into court on a charge of selling obscene literature. An examination of the books is made by the court or judge, they are decided to be not obscene, and the persons so charged are liberated. These outrages show the asinin quality of the nine or more asses forming the society, not a member of which, as is proved by the decision of the court, knowing what constitutes obscene or obscure literature.

If Dr. Gunn, who is large enough and old enough to possess good judgment, is really troubled in his conscience as to what the public shall read, so long as it does not care to read his writings, why not select such books as his activ brain thinks to be obscene, present the book in proper form to a United States or other grand jury, and then, if it be by such a body declared obscene or prejudicial to good morals, then let the matter come to trial, and the publication of the book be judicially stopped? Then, if the order of a court of competent jurisdiction be disregarded, follow with the arrest of the offender. Till a book is thus judicially pronounced obscene, its sale is no offense against the law.

In the defense of our rights as a citizen, if Mr. Comstock or Mr. Britton or Mr. Gunn, or any other person, enters our home, office, or place of business to seize upon, steal, and carry away any books or property that has not been correctly adjudged antagonistic to the public welfare, we will kill such an intruder or he will kill us then and there, and go to the public for its verdict.

We are surprised that Dr. Gunn, who has good practice as a physician and something of a good standing among men, should thus enter the list and head an organization of plunderers, among whom are well-known blackmailers.

If Dr. Gunn is hungry for notoriety, let him apply for the indictment of the editors and publishers of daily papers, who swore by all the gods on their calendars that they would openly break and defy the law forbidding publication of judicial killing by electricity, and not set out under the lead of a blackmailer to steal books without knowing what he is doing. This monkey business is bringing all law into ridicule.

Before Christianity What?

Rex Reges in Agnostic Journal.

However incredible it may seem, there are many good and worthy people who are under the impression that, prior to the introduction of Christianity, the world was wholly sunk in ignorance and licentiousness. No doubt there were plenty of unhung scoundrels; but it is also true that, long before Christianity had a place, there were astronomers, philosophers, moralists, and teachers in India, Persia, China, Assyria, and Egypt. It is also true that from Asia and Egypt the arts and sciences were introduced into Greece; and "it was there that they attained," says Professor Fiske, "that culture and perfection which renders ancient history and literature so agreeable and valuable a branch of modern knowledge. Through the Greeks the Romans afterward came into possession of the same treasure. These two nations preëminently distinguished themselvs by their merits and accomplishments in literature and the fine arts. Hence it is that there is so much in what pertains to Greece and Rome that is worthy of admiration and study." It is also true that, long anterior to the introduction of Christianity, Greece and Rome produced poets, orators, rhetoricians, grammarians, romancers, philosophers, mathematicians, geographers, historians, biographers, physicians, sculptors, and painters. It was the Thracian poet, Orpheus, who, by the masterly manipulation of the lyre, "tamed the wild beast and moved inanimate things to action." This, to be sure, is mere allegory; but it serves to show how sweet was his music. It was Greece that produced Homer, Hesiod, Sappho, Anacreon (the lyric poet who sang of rosy lips and sparkling wine), Æschylus, Pindar, Sophocles, Euripides, and other honored names. Her principal philosophers were Thales and Pythagoras. Thales founded what is called the Ionic school, and Pythagoras the Italic school. From these two schools all the subsequent sects grew. Professor Fiske tells us that the "Ionic school included in reality every branch of science, not only morals and politics, but rhetoric, mathematics, astronomy, and all that is now comprehended under natural philosophy and natural history." It was Greece that produced Anaximenes, Anaximander, Anaxagoras, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, Protagoras, and many other philosophers worthy of mention. It was in Greece that the canvas glowed under the pencil of Apelles; and it was in Greece that marble took divine form under the chisels of Phidias, Praxiteles, Alcamenes, Agoracritus, Polycletes, Myron, and Scopas. It was Greece that produced the orators and statesmen, Demosthenes, Isocrates, Lysias, Isœus, Æschines, Antiphon, Lycurgus, Solon, and Pericles. As historians the Greeks could boast of Herodotus, Thucydides, and Xenophon. It is, therefore, altogether false to say that the world was wholly sunk in ignorance and licentiousness before the introduction of Christianity. To many of the names I hav mentioned the world has looked for morality and science. Professor Fiske tells us that "the art of gem engraving reached its highest perfection among the Greeks about the time of Alexander. In this flourishing time no graver of gems equaled Pyrgoteles in celebrity. While Apelles alone was allowed by Alexander to paint his likeness, and Lysippus alone to carve his statue, Pyrgoteles was the only one permitted to sketch his miniature on the precious stone" (Manual of Classical Literature, by N. W. Fiske, p. 115).

It will be appropriate for me to observe that, with respect to the private life of the Athenians, Cocker tells us that they were "courteous, generous, and humane. While bold and free in the expression of their opinions, they paid the greatest attention to the rules of politeness, and were nicely delicate on points of decorum" (Cocker's Christianity and Greek Philosophy, pp. 47, 48). So much for Greece.

Let us now glance at the poets, philosophers, historians, statesmen, and moralists of the Romans. "Next to the Greeks," says Professor Fiske, "the Romans deserve an honorable rank in the literary history of antiquity. But in the first periods of their republic they were too much engrossed by war, and the prevailing taste was too much for conquest and for the extension of their power, to allow any considerable leisure of patronage to the arts of peace. Subsequently, however . . . they imbibed a love for letters and the sciences." Among their poets and satirists the names of Virgil, Horace, Ovid, and Juvenal will ever reflect honor on the human race. Among their orators the names of Cicero, Hortensius, Antonius, Cato, and Pliny stand prominent. Among the philosophers we hav Cicero, Seneca, Pliny the Elder, Tacitus, Marcus Aurelius, and Epictetus. The historians who are prominent as historical authors were Julius Cæsar, Sallustius, Livy, Nepos, Tacitus, Suetonius, and others.

Most assuredly, sir, it is false to say that the world was sunk in ignorance until Christianity came. Philosophy, literature, architecture, science, art, oratory, poetry—indeed, everything that goes to make life pleasant, existed long before Jesus Christ came to preach his horrible doctrin of eternal torments.

Persecuting Russian Jews and Other "Heretics."

From a New York Tribune Correspondent.

The official crusade against the Jews goes steadily from bad to worse. At first the persecuted people hoped that the ukase of the czar would be only partially enforced, and that after a time matters would settle back in their accustomed channel. But they now find all such hopes a vain delusion, and their worst fears more than realized. The decree of oppression and exile is being enforced to the very letter, without a single touch of mercy. True, government diligently sends forth denials that any persecution is in progress, and its denials are officially accepted as truth by other European governments. The fact is, however, that the most gloomy and tragic accounts that hav ever been published of the anti-Jewish campaign hav failed to express the full measure of its atrocious inhumanity. Scarcely in the days of the dragonades was a more cruel and relentless warfare waged against a helpless and unoffending people.

Apart from the almost incredible violence and outrage daily practiced upon the Jews by the soldiery, civil officials, and the populace, a number of the most stringent laws are about to be put into execution, the effect of which will be to make every Jew in Russia an outlaw. For example, the law of 1865, granting Jews permission to liv and engage in business in the interior of the empire, is to be repealed. It is said that every provincial governor in the empire urges such action, and the formal proclamation of the repeal is daily looked for. The result will be the practical extermination of at least two hundred thousand Jewish families. For then they will be absolutely forbidden to trade in any of the chief commodities of the country, such as grain, provisions, cattle, lumber, and spirits. Moreover, the majority of them who are settled in the villages will be driven from their homes and their property confiscated. This fate will befall at least half a million souls. Besides these, all the Polish Jews in the province of Russian Poland will be expelled, and the three hundred thousand Jews who in virtue of a ministerial order in 1880 were allowed to settle and trade in the interior of the empire, in the towns of Riga, Libau, Rostoff, and Kieff, where they enjoy a degree of municipal protection, will likewise be forced to leave their habitations.

While such deadly blows are struck at the Jews in their homes and business, other discriminations are being made against them. For example, it has long been the law of Russia that an only son, on whom the family is dependent for support, is, whether Jew or Christian, exempt from military service. But it is now proposed to deprive the Jew of this and other military exemptions when occasion arises for the completion of a given number of recruits. The relatiys of Jews who escape the conscription are to be fined three hundred rubles, and it is proposed, in every case of Jewish desertion, to levy a fine of six hundred rubles on the community to which he belongs. Thus the Jews are to be forced to defend with their lives the empire that outlaws them.

The question is often asked, Why does the present czar, who is personally a good man, so cruelly persecute these people? The answer is easily given. He is a religious monomaniac. He has inherited the somber fanaticism that characterized his unhappy mother, and added to it by brooding over his perils in the solitary confinement of his bomb-proof palaces. Thus he has become convinced that Nihilism is permitted to afflict him to punish him for the empire's laxity of faith. He believes that his father's death and the attempts that hav been made upon his own life are just so many dispensations of providence, sent as judgments because of Russia's tolerance of heretics. To suppress Nihilism and restore peace and security, therefore, it is only necessary to stamp out heterodoxy. So he has set his face like a flint against all who do not bow the knee to the orthodox Greek church. Upon the Jews his hand falls heavily, but not more so than upon the German Lutherans and upon the Old Believers. The latter are merely a division of the Greek church, and are distinguished for the purity and piety of their lives. But for years past the government has been sending them to Siberia by thousands for no other reason than their religious belief. In the provinces on the German border there are many Germans, or descendants of Germans, who cling to the faith of Luther. To these the Russian government officials address themselvs and attempt their conversion by every means of chicanery and threatening which they hav at command. Those of the colonists who cannot resolve to abandon the faith of their fathers are subjected to every conceivable annoyance and debasement, until, driven to distraction, they desert their homes and flee to distant lands. During the first seven months of this year more than 14,000 Germans hav thus left southern Russia, where life has become intolerable, and embarked at Odessa and other Russian ports of the Black sea. Of these colonists, one-third hav gone to settle in Roumania and the Dobrudsha, about three thousand hav migrated to the north of Asia Minor, while the remainder hav gone to South America and the Cape. The emigrants hav sold their farms for much below the real value in their eagerness to escape from so inhospitable a country.

There are, of course, many instances of so-called "conversion." A short time ago Count Ignatieff, the governor-general of Kieff, visited the Czech colony of Kwasiloff, in Rovno. In replying to the address of welcome made to him, he referred to the fact that a number of Czechs had gone over to the Orthodox Greek church, and intimated that the others would serve their own interests best by doing likewise, and would probably incur serious trouble if they did not. "God grant," said he, unctuously, "that other Czech colonists may be led to follow the good example." This had the desired effect. Almost immediately after the general's departure the seventy-four remaining Roman Catholics of the place announced that thenceforth they would be communicants of the Greek Orthodox church, by way, as a local paper remarked, of testifying their gratitude for his excellency's condescension in coming out of his way on an apostolic mission. But, as a matter of fact, these unfortunates were simply persecuted into submission. There hav been hundreds, aye, thousands of cases in which Roman Catholics, Lutherans, and Jews hav been seized bodily and dragged by main force to the baptismal font of the Greek church, or hav been driven there by virtue of bayonet prods administered by Russian soldiers.

What Catholics Teach in Parochial Schools.

From the "Catechism of Perseverance."

Question. Who was Luther?

Answer. Luther was a German religious, of the Augustinian order, who violated his three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. He apostatized, married a nun, and commenced declaring against the Catholic church.

Q. What did he write previous to his condemnation?

A. Previous to his condemnation he had written to the sovereign pontiff that he would receive his decision as an oracle from the mouth of Jesus Christ, but scarcely had Leo X. condemned his errors when he gave vent to the most vile abuse against him, against the bishops and theologians, impudently pretending that he alone was more enlightened than the whole Christian world. He persevered in preaching error, and after having led a scandalous life, died on leaving the table after having gorged himself with wines and meats.

Q. Who was Calvin?

A. Calvin was an ecclesiastic of Noyon, but was never a priest. He went to Bourges, where he adopted the errors of Luther, to which he added his own. He settled in Geneva, where he burnt to death Michael Servetus, who had the courage to differ from him, and finally died himself of a shameful disease.

Q. How do you show that Protestantism, or the religion preached by Luther, Zwingler, Calvin, and Henry VIII., is not the pure religion?

A. In order to show that Protestantism is a false religion, or rather no religion at all, it will be sufficient simply to bear in mind that it was established by four great libertins; that it owes its origin to the love of honors, covetousness of the goods of others, and the love of sexual pleasures—three things forbidden by the gospel; that it permits you to believe whatever you please, and to do whatever you believe; that it has deluged Germany, France, Switzerland, and England with blood, and leads to impiety, and finally to indifference—the source of all revolutions past and future. We must, therefore, be on our guard against those who preach it, and cherish a horror for the books which disseminate it. Again, in the "Familiar Explanation of the Christian Doctrin, Adapted for the Family and More Advanced Students in Catholic Schools and Colleges," which has the approbation of Archbishop Bailey of Baltimore, Lesson XII., "No salvation outside the Roman Catholic church."

Q. Since the Roman Catholic church alone is the true church of Jesus, can anyone who dies outside the church be saved?

A. He cannot.

Q. Did Jesus Christ himself assure us most solemnly, and in plain words, that no one can be saved out of the Roman Catholic church?

A. He did, when he said to his apostles, "Go and teach all nations."

Q. What do the fathers of the church say about the salvation of those who die out of the Roman Catholic church?

A. They all, without exception, pronounce them infallibly lost.

Q. Are there any other reasons to show that heretics or Protestants who die out of the Roman Catholic church are not saved?

A. There are several. They cannot be saved because: 1. They hav no divine faith. 2. They make a liar of Jesus Christ, the Holy Ghost, and the apostles. 3. They hav no faith in Christ. 4. They fell away from the true church. 5. They are too proud to submit to the pope, the vicar of Christ. 6. They do not perform any good works whereby they can obtain heaven. 7. They do not receive the body and blood of Christ. 8. They die in their sins. 9. They ridicule and blaspheme the mother of God and his saints. 10. They slander the spouse of Jesus Christ—the Catholic church.

Q. Now do you think God, the father, will admit into heaven those who thus make liars of his son, Jesus Christ, of the Holy Ghost, and of the apostles?

A. No. He will let them hav their portion with Lucifer in hell, who first rebelled against Christ, and who is the father of liars.

Q. Hav Protestants any faith in Christ?

A. They never had.

Q. Why not?

A. Because there never lived such a Christ as they imagin and believe in.

Q. In what kind of a Christ do they believe?

A. In such a one of whom they can make a liar, etc.

Q. Will such a faith in such a Christ save Protestants?

A. No sensible man will assert such an absurdity.

Q. What will Christ say to them on the day of judgment?

A. I know you not—because you never knew me.

. . . . . .

Q. Are Protestants willing to confess their sins to a Catholic bishop or priest, who alone has power from Christ to forgiv sins? Whose sins you shall forgiv, they are forgiven them.

A. No, for they generally hav an utter aversion to confession, and, therefore, their sins will not be forgiven throughout all eternity.

Q. What follows from this?

A. That they die in their sins and are damned.

Obituaries.

At her home in Salem township, Knox county, Ill., died on the morning of Sept. 27, 1890, Mrs. Charlotte Potter, aged 66 years and 3 months. She was the widow of Norman Z. Potter, who died in January, 1871. Both believed in a continued existence, or spiritual life, and were beloved and highly respected for their integrity, charity, benevolence, and good acts by all who intimately knew them.

Mrs. Potter had no creed. Her religion was to do good. Hers was a life of good deeds rather than of profession. She performed instead of professing. She did not withhold relief from the needy, nor turn them empty-handed from her door. She believed in the law of compensation, and was willing to rely upon her own acts as the basis of her future reward. She believed that restitution was the only true atonement. She believed in right doing, and she was righteous in the true meaning.

The funeral services were held at the family residence, on Monday, September 29th. The discourse was delivered by E. R. Brown, of Elmwood. The remains were followed by a large concourse of neighbors and friends to the last resting-place in the Uniontown cemetery.

At his home in Wayland, Mich., Dr. John Graves died September 1st, of typho-malarial fever, after a severe illness of about five weeks. The funeral was attended largely by many old residents and business men, the post-office and many of the stores being closed during the obsequies. M. B. Rawson pronounced a eulogy. In his family, he said, Dr. Graves was kind and considerate, believing that the family relations were the most sacred of all relationships, and his home was to him the dearest spot on earth. Religiously, Dr. Graves was Liberal, believing in the religion of humanity and justice. He believed that duty consisted of doing good to mankind, and so far as opportunity permitted he strove always to be found walking in that path of duty. He was neither bigoted nor arbitrary in these connections, but readily conceded to others the right claimed for himself, that of private judgment.

What They Say About the Picture Book.

From the Freethinkers' Magazine.

"The Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book." The Truth Seeker Company has just brought out this extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. The book has some 400 pages, 12x9 inches in size, an illuminated cover, and contains 185 fine full-page pictorial illustrations.

On the opposit page of each of these large illustrations is a full-page printed explanation of what they represent. From a Christian standpoint this may be considered the most blasphemous book ever issued in America, and if the crime of blasphemy had not been abolished by the constitution of the state of New York, we should expect to see Anthony Comstock following up the Truth Seeker Company with all his Christian zeal. But, after all, we think Comstock will enjoy the pictures, although they may not be exactly the kind he is most partial to, and we advise the Truth Seeker Company to mail him a copy. The pictures, we must admit, although well executed by the noted artist Watson Heston, are not all beautiful to look upon. Some are so hideous that they will shock sensitiv feelings, but then they well represent the coarse and disgusting doctrins and practices of the past and present Christian church and giv us a pictorial history, plain to be comprehended and understood, of that great abomination that was born in the Dark Ages of the world, when superstition and not science ruled mankind. And whether we are favorable or unfavorable to this kind of warfare against the church, we must admit that artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.

We must giv the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all, as the price is only $2. At twice that sum it would hav been a cheap book.

The World's Fair on Sunday.

It is time for the Freethinkers of the country to wake up and do something in regard to the opening on Sundays of the World's Fair to be held in Chicago in 1893. When the interstate commission adjourned in September decision on the subject was postponed. Secretary Dickinson, of the local commission, has since appealed to the press to assist him in obtaining a consensus of public opinion upon the matter. His office, says the organ of the Sabbatarians, is daily in receipt of written protests, appeals, and suggestions from individuals and societies representing every shade, Sabbatarianism and anti-Sabbatarianism. These documents the secretary files away, considering that, as this is to be a people's fair, the people should hav a voice in so important a matter as the Sunday question.

The American Sabbath Union is doing little besides soliciting names to petitions to close the Fair, and obtaining memorials and resolutions from religious bodies—presbyteries, conferences, churches, etc. It is probable, too, that oral arguments may be made before the commission when the matter is finally decided. The petitions being circulated by the Sabbath Union ask for Sunday closing "in the interest of . . . religion, and in compliance with the convictions of many millions of citizens who keep the Lord's day, and in accordance with God's fourth commandment of the decalog."

Considering these things, we hav drawn up a petition to offset the one of the Sabbath Union. It will be found on the last page of this paper, in such shape that it can be cut out, pasted upon foolscap paper, and circulated; and when all possible signatures in each community hav been obtained it should be returned to this office, and we will see that they are properly placed before the commission. Furthermore, not only should these (or similar) petitions be circulated and signed, but efforts should be made to hav all Secular Unions, Liberal clubs, Spiritualist societies, labor unions—all organizations which will do so—adopt resolutions and memorials asking for the Sunday opening of the Fair. These can be sent here and will be forwarded with the petitions to Chicago at the proper time. We also ask every paper, Freethought or secular, to print this petition in such shape that it can be detached and used, and also this appeal for signatures or one of their own. Every Freethought journal will no doubt be willing to care for the petitions; but those that do not wish to do so can advise their readers to send them to THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is our earnest desire to show the World's Fair commission that the people want the Fair to be open on Sunday. We ask the aid of every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and of every paper possessing sufficient backbone to deal with the subject.

The "Sunday Question" has become all over the country one of great importance and interest to the people. The Sabbatarians are making frantic efforts to bring back the national calamity of a Puritan Sabbath—a holy day, for the benefit of the church and the church creeds. One who follows their movements cannot but be impressed with their determination to tyrannize over the great mass of the people, who are too apathetic and indifferent to oppose them. The clergy fully realize that they must, to save themselvs, save their holy day. The opening or closing of the World's Fair on Sundays will be a decisiv defeat or victory for them, and they are using their power and organizations energetically to make it a victory. But there is no doubt that the people are against them, if only the people will take the trouble to be heard. A Chicago paper, the Evening Post, is asking for votes on the subject, and two weeks' balloting shows nearly two to one in favor of Sunday opening. But the bigots oppose it as though concurrently with the opening a law is to be passed compelling them to attend! They do not and will not admit that others than themselvs hav any rights.

The National Commission will not settle this question for several months, possibly not until the Fair is about to be opened. We shall, therefore, hav plenty of time in which to roll up a big petition, and we earnestly ask every Freethinker in the country to circulate these petitions, and to keep them circulating.

Sunday Opening of Museums and Libraries.

The Boston Herald givs the result of Sunday opening of the Museum of Fine Arts in that city as most encouraging. The average attendance on the first day of the week has been about twelve hundred, and Sunday before last it reached to nearly three thousand. The Sunday spectators, it says, come from working people, without even a minority representation from the kid-glove element. There are men, women, and children, but the proportion of men is much greater than on any other day of the week. They are workingmen, as they show plainly enough, but they come with an evident desire to learn something as well as to be entertained, as they buy catalogs and study them assiduously. Sunday, too, is particularly the day foreigners—Italians, Chinamen, and Japanese—are the most appreciativ, if numbers be taken as a criterion. Occasionally there are what are called Italian days, when Italy's exiled sons and daughters come in multitudes, many of the women wearing their picturesque nativ costumes. They are chiefly interested in the sculpture halls, and as a rule show a better knowledge of the copies of the old-world masterpieces than does the nativ Bostonian. They are used to nude statues, and never make a ridiculous fuss over them, as Americans sometimes do. The Japanese spectators are also intelligently appreciativ, but chiefly in the direction of their own national art. The collection of lacquers they find in the museum is superior to any other in the world, and even in Japan there is nothing like it now, so they say.

Sunday is a day given to the public by the trustees of the museum, and that it is so thoroughly appreciated must be gratifying to them. Their example ought to make the trustees of the Museum of Art in this city ashamed, but it probably will not, for our trustees are influenced by a few fanatical bigots and care more for religion than for the people.

Another example set "our own dear trustees," as Life affectionately terms them, is by the trustees of the Duluth Public Library. The Tribune of that city prints this item of news: "The public library board met last evening in the library rooms and did some routine work, such as auditing bills. The subject of keeping the reading-room open on Sunday came up for discussion, and great surprise was expressed by all present that the public should hav got the impression that the doors would be closed on Sunday. No such thought has ever been entertained, and a notice will be prepared in a short time for publication in the newspapers, contradicting such rumors. There were present at the meeting last evening seven out of nine members of the board, and they were all unanimous in favor of keeping open on Sunday."

New York is a great city, but some of its "prominent citizens" are a good deal smaller than their contemporaries in other places.

Horace Seaver Fitly Honored.

The committee having charge of the work of erecting a monument to Horace Seaver hav completed their task and made a report thereof in the last issue of the Investigator. On Tuesday, the 30th ult., those of Mr. Seaver's friends who could be present unveiled in Forest Hill Cemetery a granit monument "in testimony of their esteem, and in commemoration of his services in the cause of universal mental liberty and free speech."

The monument is fifteen feet high and at the base four feet square. It is composed of base, plinth, sub-plinth, die, and shaft. The sub-plinth and die are elaborately molded, and the die is polished, and has inscriptions suitable to the character and labors of Mr. Seaver on its four sides. The inscription on the face reads:

"Horace Seaver, born Aug. 25, 1810; died Aug. 21, 1889. Editor of the Boston Investigator for 50 years, 1839–1889."

On the right side are the following quotations from the eulogy delivered by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll at the funeral of the deceased:

"Horace Seaver lived for others." "He always sought for light." "He was a friend of all the world and sought to civilize the human race." "There was no taint or touch of malice in his blood." "He had the brain of a philosopher and the heart of a child." "He did not ask God to forgiv his enemies, he forgave them himself." "Sacred are the lips from which hav issued only truth."

On the left side the following quotations from the works of the deceased appear:

"One world at a time." "The right to think freely upon all subjects belongs to us naturally, and no government can deprive us of it."

On the reverse side of the monument appears the following:

"This monument is erected to the memory of Horace Seaver by his friends, in recognition of his great services in the cause of Universal Mental Liberty."

The cost of the monument, including the lot and incidentals, was $1,267.20, and was raised by subscription among the Freethinking friends of Mr. Seaver throughout the United States. It was designed and executed by Mr. John Harrington, of Boston, Mass., and was erected under the direction of a committee composed of Mr. J. P. Mendum, Mr. L. K. Washburn, Mr. Ernest Mendum, Mr. John A. O'Malley, Mr. W. D. Rockwood, and Mr. Geo. N. Hill.

Thus has been done what can be done by outward show to keep alive the memory of the man who for fifty years as editor of a Freethought paper labored unceasingly for the world—to improve it and make it freer. His better monument is the fact that his efforts were not wholly unsuccessful. This country is more civilized than it used to be, though in some spots persecuting superstition is yet powerful. But fanaticism has receded a great deal before the army of progress, and in that army Mr. Seaver was a brave and able leader. Let the granit of his monument be imperishable and it will still fail to express to the unheeding world all it owes to him.

The Responsibilities of the Excommunicators.

The supreme court of Massachusetts has made it dangerous for the Romish priests to further excommunicate, boycott, and bulldoze their parishioners, as they are in the habit of doing when the parishioners do not obey them or pay them sufficiently. Hereafter priests will hav to assume pecuniary if not penal responsibility when denouncing church-members from the pulpit.

The complainant against the priest was a physician and had been a parishioner of the defendant. His wife had obtained a divorce from him and he had married again. As soon as the priest learned of this he took occasion to speak of it in a sermon to his congregation. He announced that the marriage of a divorced communicant was forbidden by the church and worked excommunication. He then notified his congregation that he would not administer to any one in sickness who was attended by an excommunicated physician—that "a priest in his sacred function cannot remain at the same time as an excommunicant under the same roof."

The complainant was not named in these remarks, but there was no room for doubt that he was the person meant. Their effect was to deter not only many Catholics but also some others from employing him as a physician. He thereupon brought an action against the priest for defamation and professional injury. The jury found that the course of the priest had been malicious and for the purpose of injuring the complainant as a physician. A verdict for damages was rendered, and an appeal taken to the supreme court on exceptions to the right of maintaining an action under the circumstances of this case.

The court overrules the exceptions and sustains the verdict. The judge said:

"These words did not merely instruct the congregation that the effect of a second marriage under the circumstances which existed was to excommunicate the plaintiff from the Catholic church, but they proceeded to impute against the plaintiff that such marriage or such excommunication should debar him from being employed as a physician in the parish and that patients who employed the plaintiff as a physician could not in their sickness hav the ministrations of the defendant as their priest.

"But the jury might well find that the plaintiff was a suitable person to be employed there as a physician, notwithstanding his marriage and its ecclesiastical consequences."

Hereafter priests in Massachusetts will carry their heads a little lower in the air; and it is pleasant to think that there is one spot of the earth that the Romish church does not own.

Polygamy Honestly Abandoned.

It seems to be a cause of grief to some of the religious people that the Mormons hav finally renounced polygamy. These good folks, who love their enemies, accuse the Saints of not being honest in their statements, and of still being inimical to the public welfare. But it is evident that the reason for saying this is because the abandonment of polygamy leaves the Christians no legal excuse for further persecuting the Mormons, which is extremely unpleasant for the good Christians. The Rev. Robert McNeice, Presbyterian, of Salt Lake City, reveals this in his communication to the Independent, when he says: "There is a far greater curse to this territory than polygamy, which they do not pretend to hav abandoned, namely, the right of priesthood government on American soil. Polygamy is simply an offshoot of their priesthood dictation in civil affairs. They hav pruned off this little sprout, but hav left the upas tree unmolested." That shows clearly enough that now that polygamy is out of the way the Rev. Mr. McNeice desires to pursue the Mormons for other purposes. Perhaps he wants to force them all to support him!

But that polygamy is a thing of the past with the Mormons is believed by men well qualified to judge. Judge Zane has recognized the action of the church as sincere and final, and has rescinded the rule excluding Mormon aliens from naturalization. The Hon. A. L. Thomas, governor of the territory, says: "If the action taken by the Mormons was not taken in good faith, still the result, so far as polygamy is concerned, is the same. It has been buried, never to be resurrected." This may be unwelcome news to the militant Christians, but it seems to be true news.

The manner of renouncing the doctrin of celestial marriage is thus related by the president of the Mormon church. It shows how deeply sunk in superstition and foolish faith the Mormons are:

"At the great conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, on Monday, attended by apostles, bishops, elders, and about one thousand members, the declaration forbidding future marriages in violation of law was read, and the following resolution adopted by unanimous vote, viz.: 'I move that, recognizing Wilford Woodruff as the president of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and the only man on the earth, at the present time, who holds the keys of the sealing ordinances, we consider him fully authorized, by virtue of his position, to issue the manifesto which has been read in our hearing, and which is dated Sept. 24, 1890, and that as a church in general conference assembled, we accept his declaration concerning plural marriages as authoritativ and binding."

Commenting upon the action of his church Mr. Woodruff says: "This action of the conference is conclusiv. The church has no disposition to violate the laws or defy the government. The revelation of God requires us to obey the constitutional laws of the land. The Supreme Court of the United States is the legal interpreter of the laws and the final arbitrator as to their validity. The territorial convention has also pronounced in favor of full allegiance to the government and willing submission to its authority." The Mormons are blinded by faith and believe Mr. Woodruff to speak "by the card," and so will doubtless obey the new revelation. But they are in this no worse nor better than the members of other churches, and time and education will remedy the evil for them as for the Roman Catholics, Methodists, and other sects.

A Dangerous Judge.

In Liberty we find the record of an incident not previously noted. Recently ten persons were arrested and brought before a Baltimore justice on the charge of creating a disturbance at a meeting of revolutionists. The individual who addressed the meeting denied the existence of God and urged revolution and the abolition of private property. His opponents, very orthodox people, became excited and threatened to assault the speaker and his sympathizers. The justice, Mr. Columbus Hobbs, addressing the prisoners, said: "It is a pity that the police did not bring every person in that hall to this station. Without question that meeting was an unlawful assembly. You assembled there on the Sabbath to discuss the questions, 'Is there a God?' and the like, and Socialism, Anarchism, and so on. I regard any assembly to dispute the existence of God as unlawful, and particularly by a lot of unnaturalized foreigners who hav no sympathy with our government. Those who believe in God had no right to go there. No one had a right to go there to discuss Socialism and Anarchism. It is unlawful to do so, and I shall do all in my power to punish such offenders brought before me. I do not propose to hav a repetition of the Haymarket riot of Chicago, and the police department, too, will prevent such a riot. But you had no right to go to this meeting. By doing so you placed yourselvs upon a level with the Anarchists, if you say you are not such, and, as you certainly aided in creating the disorder, I fine each $1 and costs."

The comment of Liberty upon this is that "the list of immortal asses on the bench is getting long." But the curse of the matter is far deeper than the idiocy of a judge. It is the union of church and state, the subserviency of the latter to the former, that makes such incidents painful to true Americans and causes the hot blood of anger to start. Such officials as this in Baltimore, who make their office the tool of their religion, are the ones who will, if their numbers increase, destroy this republic by making it a practical theocracy. They are precisely the sort of men who did the cruel and infamous work of the Inquisition; they would do it again were the Roman church or the Covenanter Reformers to obtain power. They hav no conception of liberty; they are not Americans except by accident of birth; they are men dangerous to entrust with power.

Christianity is responsible for a vast amount of foolishness and superstition; for a vast amount of tyranny; and this Baltimore idiot is a product in which all these qualities are harmoniously blended. He may safely be taken as a type of a true Christian—ignorant, at least of law and the principles of our government; foolish in his judgment; superstitious in his mental attributes; and tyrannical to the extent of his power. He is more dangerous to the real welfare of the community of Baltimore than all the Anarchists and Socialists in the city!

Why?

Our Seventh Day Advent contemporary, the American Sentinel, says:

"Both Christ and the apostles taught submission to rightful authority."

Why don't the Adventists, then, submit to the Sunday laws of the various states instead of resorting to the courts to oppose them? Is not a state legislature a "rightful authority?"

Editorial Notes.

MR. HARMAN was called into court October 16th to plead to the indictment for mailing the O'Neil letter. The case was continued to the November term of court. The first issue of Lucifer published in Topeka was refused newspaper rates by the postmaster, who has sent to Washington for orders from Wanamaker as to its registration. It looks as though there is a systematic official conspiracy to break up Mr. Harman's business and again put him in jail.

OF Mrs. Colman's "Reminiscences" (price $1) the Evening Post says: "Mrs. Colman, after her second widowhood, became a lecturer in the antislavery and other reformatory causes, and her excellent narrativ vividly depicts the discomforts, exposures, and mob perils of such devotion. It is a fit pendant to Parker Pillsbury's 'Acts of the Antislavery Apostles.' When slavery was practically done for by the war, Mrs. Colman naturally became a teacher of the freedmen at the capital. She had been a confidant of John Brown, and she gives us an account of interviews with Lincoln, as well as of her visit to Richmond after the surrender; in fact, in many ways her 'Reminiscences' possess a genuin historical value. They are defectiv chiefly as to dates, but there is a steady sequence in them. The phases of American civilization (not yet outgrown) which they uncover cannot be retraced without a feeling of shame, nor also without moral profit and a sense of high respect for the author's strength of mind and disinterested service to the outcast."

THE Rev. Charles O. Brown, of a Congregational church in Dubuque, Ia., forwards to the Independent the following items regarding the confiscation of public schools by Roman Catholic priests: "At Key West, three miles southwest of Dubuque, the public school is in the same yard with the Catholic church, and is taught by nuns, who teach the Roman catechism as a regular study. At the time of the writer's visit school was dismissed that the children might 'go riding with the sisters' to a neighboring convent. At New Mallory and Prairie Creek, the Roman Catholic catechism is regularly taught, the writer himself having been present at one of the recitations on the observance of mass. At Bernard a similar state of things exists. At Wilton, near Asbury, three miles northwest, several years ago a priest ordered and secured the removal of the public school from its own to a building of his selection, where he regularly heard recitations in the Catholic catechism, and where he was accustomed to order the whipping of different pupils. At Holy Cross the public school building was sold years ago, and the public school is now in a building on church property, taught by nuns. All of the above places are in Dubuque county. The following places are in Jackson county. At Spring Brook a state of things very similar to that in Holy Cross exists. At Spruce Creek, Otter Creek, Butler, and many other places, the catechism is taught. At La Motte the school is in a building next to the Catholic church, which the former bishop, Smythe, persuaded the directors to erect on church land. This was done, and the house was paid for with public money. The present bishop, upon coming into the diocese, laid claim to the property, and has since controled it. At one time a law-suit was imminent, but the Catholic who dared to oppose his bishop died, and so the matter was dropped. It is needless to add that the Roman catechism is taught there. At the time of he writer's visit to that neighborhood, school was dismissed that teacher and pupils might attend a 'mission' which priests from Chicago were conducting. But it is reserved for Tete-de-Morte, a little village about eight miles north of Bellevue, to cap this sheaf, for there the public school of District No. 2 is in a four-storied nunnery, which is flanked by a Catholic church and cemetery with a life-size image of the cross, in the same yard! Of course, the school is taught by nuns, and, equally of course, the Roman catechism is taught. These are only instances. Many more might be given. In many of these schools not only is the catechism taught, but Roman Catholic text-books, filled with exaggerations and perversions of American history, are in use. Facts which hav more recently come to the writer persuade him that Clayton and Delaware counties are also suffering from similar abuses, but to what extent he is not at present ready to say."

Letters from Friends.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Sept. 29, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed is a good thing, and I think it is not much known:

Among the questions debated by the wise men in Israel was one which is freely discussed at the present day, viz.: Is life worth living? For full two years and a half the schools of Shammai and Hillel contended on the point whether it was better for man to hav been created. When at last a vote was taken, a majority declared it would hav been better for man not to hav been created. But an addition was made to the resolution, that since man was in being he should be very careful in his actions.—Talmud (Schaff and Herzog's Cyclopedia of Religious Knowledge). H. F. P.

BOSTON, MASS., Aug. 27, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The "Pictorial Text-Book" givs me great satisfaction and pleasure. I must congratulate THE TRUTH SEEKER on its issue. It is the most powerful club against superstition that has ever been invented. Mr. Heston is to be highly complimented on his genius and skill. The book of pictures ought to be in every household. It is admirable. I would not part with it for $50, if no more could be had.

I am glad the biblical pictures are coming out. I shall want several copies.

At present please find inclosed $5, for which send me two copies of the "Pictorial Text-Book" and one copy of the biblical pictures when ready. RUFUS K. NOYES, M.D.

FINDLAY, O., Oct. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I submit the following question for enlightenment, and not for debate or other disquisition, and hope some one will be kind enough to set me right on this point. Do real, substantial atoms pass off in streams from a steel magnet, which of course are beyond the cognition of any one of our senses, and yet are capable of penetrating and passing through plates of glass inclosing between them sheets of imporous water, and, at the same time, with such invisible and powerful threads as to seize bars of iron thus insulated from the magnet and physically move them, thus producing a corporeal result by an intangible substance? And does then, if such real, material atoms do emanate from such a magnet and produce a physical result—I ask, does then magnetism, or this intangible power, become an entity, a substantial "something," although beyond the power of our five senses to perceive? Hoping you will understand the query. I respectfully submit it to your care and inspection, hoping to be rightly informed on this point. S. H. ZIMMERMAN.

KNOX, NEB., Oct. 1, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I was born in Racine county, Wis., in 1860 My father was Irish. My mother was born in New York city; she was of Scotch-Irish descent. Father attended the Catholic church, and brought me up a Catholic. When I was a boy of twelve the priest came to our house, and father showed him some books I had. He told father to destroy them all except a novel—he said there was no harm in reading that. We were very poor. And father signed a note for ten dollars payable to the church. When it fell due they sued him for the amount. This distressed us very much. Father became sick and poor so he could not go to church, and though he was a good Catholic they treated him as a criminal, a heretic. When he died they would not come to his funeral. I got a preacher to preach the sermon. While we went to the funeral some of them came to our house and called the two children we left there hogs and other names. I did not go to church, but I did nothing against it. They said I was a thief and liar, and did all they could to destroy my reputation. This is the reason I am an Infidel.

I will add the following scheme of an upright voting system. The voters of each township shall meet and choose by ballot one of their number to go to county convention. When the township delegates meet they shall choose one of their number by ballot to go to the state convention. Then each delegate shall write his name on a blank ticket and vote it. After all hav voted the chairman of the convention shall mix the names and draw the county officers from the whole number. One delegate shall go from each county to the state convention. The state convention shall elect by ballot one of their number to go to the national convention. Each state shall send one delegate. Each delegate shall write his or her name on a ticket and vote. When all hav voted, the chairman shall mix the names and draw a name. The delegate whose name is drawn shall be president of the United States. This is an answer to the query how force and fraud can be driven out of politics.

J. F. MORRISSEY.

Oct. 7, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I am not a subscriber to your paper, but I occasionally see a copy and sometimes write you a few words. I happened to see to-day the overwhelming responses to my letter of some months ago. Everyone who read them must be convinced that Anarchy is very wicked, and that J. P. Guild is the prince of reasoners. Some of his answers would actually make a horse laugh.

I presume Mr Guild is a very nice kind of a man, but he evidently made up his mind that certain things were so, and other things were not so, several years ago, and it would not be possible for him to think in another channel for a moment.

I am a theoretical Anarchist. I believe in freedom—in unrestrained freedom. The only way for the great millennium to be reached is for each man to do no harm or violence to any other man—in short, to keep the Golden Rule.

I do not believe in the monopoly of vacant land; therefore I monopolize no vacant land; I do not believe that interest, rent, profits, or taxes should be collected; therefore I refuse to take advantage of laws which would giv me these gains. I do not believe in a government by force; consequently I do nothing that anyone would arrest me for. I refuse all offices or political positions, and refuse even to countenance the government by voting.

I do not pretend that I am a Jesus Christ or a Thomas Paine, but if all men and women were like me we should need no laws. As fast as men become sufficiently civilized, they leave the throng of greedy, selfish seekers after place and gain, and liv as do the peaceable Anarchists, independent of laws or of the government.

If a man assaults me, I would not hav him arrested; if he robs my purse, or does me any other injury, I feel no differently toward him than I do toward the tariff collector or the tax collector, who, like the highwayman, says, "Stand and deliver." I would pay as liberal a tax as any other man, in proportion to my means, even if I were not compelled to do so. I hate compulsion. As long as we are compelled to do anything we are slaves. A. G. CHAPIN.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Oct. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, has the name of being the most Liberal publication printed. If so, you may not take a few words amiss from an occasional reader.

To commence, I feel shocked at the indifference of most of your contributors to their condition in the eternal future, and their expressed contempt for the holy Bible. To me the matter is terrible. Proud in their own estimation, they scornfully reject the holy Jesus and even exult in their boldness. They flatter themselvs they can save themselvs by logic. Well, Mr. Editor, logic is a great thing, but is there not such a thing as the logic of facts? Is it not apparent that man by nature is a sinner? Is it not apparent that without a mediator he deserves hell? I am not afraid to assert that the devil is the prince of logicians, and is ever-persuasiv save with the redeemed. Alas, how many so-called reformers, such as Bruno, Hess, and the immortal John Rogers, in their burnings on earth found to their sorrow it was only the commencement of their eternal burnings in hell. There are thousands vainly trying in their ignorance to create sympathy for these daring reformers, but alas, it comes too late, for:

There are no acts of pardon passed
In the cold grave to which we haste,
But groans and shrieks and fell despair
Dwell in eternal echo there.

O Mr. Editor, do awaken to your responsibility as a teacher. Alas, how many thousands are now roasting in hell through the false teachings of Tom Paine, all perhaps looking up for relief, yea, for a single blat, from the holy lamb they had rejected.

If I was given to humor I could almost smile at John Peck's description of his India-rubber God and Heston's Bible pictures, but I must really sigh at Aunt Elmina in her vain preachment on moral purity while rejecting, as it were, gospel aid. Alas, how often is religious faith derided! True, the world cannot exist without faith; faith is essential in every department of life. Hence it follows that faith with reason is far less meritorious and more carnal than faith without reason. The carnal reasoner can well absorb and comprehend the plain narrativs of facts of the Holy Bible, but it requires the faith of a Christian, of a Talmage, to absorb its startling miracles.

Pause, heedless sinner, stop and think
Before you further go;
Why will you dance upon the brink
Of everlasting woe?

BYRON, MINN., Oct. 5, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: The debate held at Kasson, Minn., for eight nights, between Mr. Jamieson and Rev. L. T. Nichols, has just closed, and Mr. Nichols and followers hav returned to their homes. Mr. Jamieson is now delivering a course of lectures at Mantorville. When through there he will go to Albert Lea, in response to a call from the Lord. The Rev. Mr. Nichols was a success in debate, with three exceptions, viz., proofs, reason, or arguments. Telling what he believed, what he thought he knew, he was a success, and I want to giv him credit for his courage in meeting Mr. Jamieson in a public discussion, and defending the Bible the best I ever heard or read of being done. Mr. Jamieson drove him out of the King James version of the holy book the first night, and the reverend gentleman was obliged to buckle on the armor of the Lord in the shape of the Hebrew Bible, and own up that the King James version of the Bible taught polygamy, slavery, and intemperance, and therefore was not of divine origin. He was asked by Mr. Jamieson if the Hebrew Bible was divine, but his reply has not as yet reached my ears.

The "Pictorial Text-Book" was received, and I would not take $10 for it if I could not get another like it.

I do not wish to say the least thing that would hurt the feelings of our Seventh Day Adventist friends, as I think they are doing what they can to keep church and state separate, but I do not understand what they mean when they say that it is a sign of prophecy that it is God's desire to hav a Sunday law passed, etc., and they at the same time petitioning Congress not to pass a Sunday Rest bill—in fact, asking Congressmen to act contrary to the will of their God of prophecy. All of this seems to me to be the hight of absurdity. Again, they say that they are following God's commandments, keeping the Sabbath of the Bible, in short, are God's chosen people, etc., and yet their own God allows them to be persecuted, arrested, by other Christians for keeping the Sabbath that their God taught. O consistency, thou art surely a jewel.

I hope that the Liberals will agitate the question of secret organization until it will take a definit position or adoption. Wishing your valuable paper success and its readers happiness, I am, Fraternally yours, WALTER A. JOHNSON.

ELM SPRINGS, ARK., Oct. 8, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I claim to be a member of the TRUTH SEEKER family, and ask a small space in our paper in which, more particularly than any other subject, to call attention to the condition of Prof. J. H. Cook, who is seventy years old, and helpless, poor, and alone. He livs near Columbus, Kan. We hav become acquainted with him by corresponding through the mail. I hav just turned my eighteenth year, and cannot say as yet that I am competent to take care of myself right. But the time for all the young people that read THE TRUTH SEEKER to bless old Mr. Cook is while he is living. I hav a slow way of getting means to help even myself, but I shall divide with him all I can. If all of us young folks would send him fifty cents, just think how rich in comforts and supplies it would make him for the coming winter. I attended the Christian camp-meeting last week here in our neighborhood, and at the conclusion their preacher called on the people for donations for the support of old worn-out preachers. And very many of them walked up with their dollar, while others gave fifty and twenty-five cents. We surely can reach out as earnestly and tenderly and help Mr. Cook.

Remember there are not a great many worthy old workers in our ranks who need help, so let us all speak out at once and send him our help in the way of a few cents each. All send your help direct to Prof. J. H. Cook, Columbus, Kan., with a few kindly words to cheer him in his loneliness. And we shall all feel that we hav made the world richer. I am forced to the conclusion that we must help with our means and counsel or the cross will stay above the throne as it is now. Practically speaking, in this country Christians, as crude and cruel as their teachers are to them, will take their last dollar to help them. Let me refer you to the four Christians hanged in New York city in 1889, for murder, and Christians murdered them in return. Turn to it again and see how forcible Mr. Heston made it by illustration. "They are coming, blessed savior, open wide the pearly gates." Father Abraham and the angels are in the picture ready to welcome to a state of honor and felicity those who were not considered fit to liv with crude Christians in a cruel world like this, made so by such teachings.

Now in conclusion I want to say to all the young folks to send for the "Pictorial Text-Book." Then you can turn page after page and see the practical application of the atonement taught by this historical scheme of redemption. My sister received a copy last week, and we think it is the eye-opener. FANNY DAY.

EAST RANDOLPH, N. Y., Sept. 28, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I never realized the bitter contempt Christians had toward each other until recently. It is rather amusing for an outsider to listen to remarks derogatory to Rev. C. W. Foulk and wife and to see this "Christian" preacher and his wife retort through the local paper, the Courant. It seems the lamb and the lion are far from being at peace with each other.

Rev. Dr. Henry Ward Beecher has truly said, "The forest of theology will hav to be cut down and destroyed so that we can plant Liberalism and the religion of humanity." Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll says, "Humanity is the only religion." And Thomas Paine says, "The world is my country, and to do good my religion." The contrast between humanity and Christianity is widening as the years glide by. Humanity is a sweet angel that will lift us into higher aims in life than Christianity ever dreamed of. What has Christianity done for humanity? It has robbed and killed countless thousands of the grandest men, women, and children. Christianity has caused streams of blood to ooze from the sides of the best reformers of this world, and I am often amazed, when I think of what Christianity has done to retard the progress of the race, that so many people, intelligent people too, cling to the rotten hulk that is sinking—cling to creeds that even revision cannot save. John Peck, "the Learned Blacksmith," of Naples, N. Y., very truly and forcibly writes, with a pen of steel, truths, as lasting as the stars, about God and Christianity.

Christianity boasts that the Bible and the churches are the safeguards of the nation, and to obliterate them would increase crime. Crime always has increased and always will increase where the Bible and church are. Evidences of this fact are too numerous to mention. It is remarkable that Christianity is so well represented in all the jails and prisons of America, if her influence is so ennobling. Go consult the inmates of various prisons, ask them if they belong to any church. They invariably will say, "Yes!" It might be unfair to say the Catholic church furnished the most criminals. The Methodist church is well represented, and I know some Methodists who are away from home when they are outside of prison—especially Methodists who defrauded me out of money I earned by hard work. My contempt glows like the iron and steel I hammer when I think of these contemptible scoundrels. There is not a paper published in America but some time during the year it speaks of the rascality of preachers and church-members. Yet they hav the impudence to claim they are perfect, and the "world's people" are the opposit of perfect.

Woman's path from servitude to freedom has been a most heroic struggle for what little freedom she possesses. Still her limbs are chained; still her white hands are bound. Oh, will she ever gain her anticipated release? Not until she discountenances the claims of the church, whose willing slave she is. Let the women of our fair land repudiate their allegiance to this dry-goods box with a steeple on top of it, and soon it will crumble, and from its ashes will spring the blooming flower of liberty!

Take theology from the world, and the money wasted on superstition will do away with want. Be it remembered that for thirty years Europe was one vast battle-field, and the war was produced by the Bible. All the instruments of torture were produced by the word of God. The Bible and Christianity upheld slavery in the South. The Bible was the auction-block. The first man sent to paradise by Christ was a thief, and his favorit female companion was a prostitute, while murderers, next to priests and idiots, draw fewer blanks in the celestial lottery than any other class.

But enough of this. I hav a dream that the future will be populated by a better class of people; that freedom and knowledge will be enthroned where now slavery and superstition reign supreme; that glorious woman will be honored and that she will be coequal with man, and justice, like the rings of Saturn, will girdle the world. And if my dream does not prove true it will not be my fault. R. R. JONES.

LINCOLN, NEB., Oct. 10, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of your paper for several years, and hav never been more interested than I hav of late on reading the several articles upon the subject of Liberal organization. I should be pleased, through the columns of your valuable paper, to add my mite in regard to the views I hav relativ to this important subject. I think every intelligent Liberal will coincide with me when I say that we need an institution that shall be Liberal in the broadest sense of the term. We as Liberals are constantly crying, "Total separation of church and state," while at the same time the orthodox Christian replies, "Take the God principle out of our church and state constitutions and we hav no foundation upon which the various creeds can successfully build and the good and wholesome laws of this great nation be based." While we do not doubt that the Christians' whole superstructure would be sadly endangered by an eradication of his theoretical God from the various creeds, we are at a loss to see how he is of such magnitude among the lawmakers and politicians of the nineteenth century. But the most forcible way to illustrate the truthfulness of any profession is to practice its precepts, and those who see the results, if they are intelligent and look upon the matter without prejudice, will not be slow in coming to the conclusion that bonds of union depend less upon compacts that rest on a belief in a personal God or a supreme being who smiles approvingly on their efforts and superintends their every affair, than on the fact of personal contact and personal covenants accepted and agreed to mutually with fraternal and humane objects in view.

There are a few institutions for the relief of distress and the elevation of human character that are noble institutions, and are doing more to alleviate the wants of suffering humanity, notwithstanding the God idea embodied in their several rituals, than all of the many different religious organizations combined. And in most of these fraternal institutions the religious cloak of the pious fraud goes no farther than the anteroom, and even subjects of a religious nature are generally not tolerated within their councils. Hence all come together in unity so far as may be possible where many are disposed to look to divine wisdom rather than human intelligence for guidance.

I heartily indorse the idea projected by your several correspondents with regard to the organization of a Liberal order. Let it be secret enough for protection. Let the objects be for the promotion of human interests. Let such a constitution be adopted that even the Christian could find no fault barring the omission of his plastic God from its esoteric work.

There is a world-wide field for work in this direction, and I think were the object promulgated we would hav an institution of intelligence and progress, and one that all humanity could indorse, inasmuch as its objects would all tend to the relief of human society, not only from the struggles incident to it, but from the superstitious fears that hav been inculcated by the teachings of the past.

Let us commence at once. Let everyone who favors the organization of a Liberal benefit or protectiv society, voice his sentiments through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, if the Editor will allow. Let us start the ball now and keep it rolling until our object is attained, and we will not only hav one of the grandest organizations of the age, but prove beyond a doubt that intelligence and sound morality are a better foundation for such a superstructure than the strongest belief in superstition—something made from nothing and the vast number of absurd ideas contained in so-called sacred writ.

Therefore, Mr. Editor, I move, if I am in order, that you appoint a committee from among the intelligent Freethinkers of the United States to prepare an outline of constitution and by-laws to govern such a society, and submit the same to the readers of your great paper. I may be a little previous in this, but at all events I hope I may be the means of stimulating some one to action who can deal more intelligently with this important matter. J. H. GUTHRIE.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' HOME, QUINCY, ILL., Oct. 3, 290.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read Mr. Wettstein on Why he is not an Agnostic. It occurs to me that the gentleman has fallen far short of what he might hav done in the matter of adducing evidence, though it is the duty of orthodox who take the affirmativ to prove their position. So I hav concluded to offer for your valuable paper at least some of the reasons, including Mr. Wettstein's. And I wish to say that this is a difficult subject to treat upon, for various reasons. First, the majority of people regard the subject as too sacred to meddle with, while others hav thought but little and know nothing as to the real meaning of those terms about which I am about to treat. And lastly, there is such a diversity of opinion, such a mental deformity, so much confidence in imagination and superstition, as to render logical conclusions almost abortiv, and in most minds to throw the orbit of reason entirely in the shade. So when I advance from the negativ and affirm that I know there is no God, I am charged with bigotry, presumption, and folly, as everyone is who extends the hospitality of the brain to a new idea. For though people in general admire physical courage they almost unanimously denounce mental courage, that being in advance of the ordinary evolution of the human race. But to come to the point why I am not an Agnostic. It would be easier had I only to answer the intelligent Bible-reader who contends that God, Christ, Jehovah, is God, and that he or such a power is the great first cause, creator, and infinit. For such a being can soon be proved to a logical person to be an utter impossibility, from the following facts, viz., an infinit, perfect being could not create what would result in imperfections. I know some will resort to the fallacious arguments of man's fall. Man's fall could not possibly affect all departments of nature, and yet deformity, cruelty, and misery infest all—not only the vicious, wicked, and cruel, but the virtuous, innocent, and loving. And the innocent seem to suffer most. When the orthodox, and many who seem to be partly emancipated from superstition, are thus confronted, they often reply, "But there must be some overruling power and a creator, for how did this world come into existence?" As to the overruling power, we may admit that with propriety, but not that it is God or any evidence of God's existence, but to the contrary, from the fact that as the world is not governed in accord with the highest and best principles, hopes, aims, judgments, and results, but imperfectly, then those who claim God as its author charge him falsely; and it is better to know and say there is no God, than to say there is a God and accuse him wrongfully. As to the hypothesis of creation, I know that reason, experience, and observation, the holy trinity of knowledge, teach that it is as impossible for omnipotent power to make something out of nothing as it is for us to, and as something cannot be changed to nothing the universe could not hav been produced from nothing; and a great first cause is impossible, from the fact that it would be without a beginning, which would be allowing that something sprang from nothing.

The charge is often made that, as we cannot offer anything in place of orthodox creation, we are destroying without building. To which I answer: While one is an occupant of a building or behind a wall he cannot see a palace though it be ever so near and well furnished, so while one is in belief of a falsehood the opposit truth is of course unseen.

In addition to the above reasons for knowing there is no God, there are to be introduced the following. Imagination cannot be real, and people differ in regard to this so-called God, as regards his most important attributes and character, and he fails to giv them the proper knowledge when it is so necessary for their good and his glory. And in every so-called revealed religion this being has been favored with a masculin gender and man has ever been his favorit. All this goes to prove that man has made God in his own image Now, it really appears to me there is no hope for the orthodox unless they can prove that imagination is worth more than reality.

Next I will state why I know there is no devil. We know that in man and animals there is an evil disposition manifested. Indeed, this good and evil disposition from which God and devil are inferred, is seen in and throughout all nature. This is no evidence that all are actuated by two personal spirits who are above and beyond nature. Certain surrounding circumstances produce certain evil effects. If a circumstance produces misery we call it evil and lay the blame on the devil; if happiness, we call it good and credit God with the results, thus tracing the matter to an unnatural cause beyond its embryo. How much better it would be for all parties concerned if each action was traced to its natural cause, encouraging virtue in the good, excusing or denouncing the vicious as they really deserve, and not trying to shift any blame or credit to an imaginary God or devil. And really this is becoming the practice in litigation, notwithstanding our spurious theology.

I now come to consider why I am not an Agnostic in regard to the immortal soul. As far as my experience goes, and in accord with what I can learn from dictionaries, the mind and soul are synonymous terms. And when one is knocked senseless he is deprived of his soul or mind during the length of time he is in a senseless condition, which is due to inaction of the brain. Then when the body dies the brain ceases to act, the soul or mind dies with the body, and all this talk about the immortality of the soul is imaginary.

As it seems to me I hav shown sufficiently that God, devil, and soul are only imaginary and not real, it is useless for me to attempt to delineate or deduce any proof of spirits, witches, ghosts, etc., being of the same kind of material. And I firmly believe that as in the cemetery of the past most of the Gods are buried, so the remainder will hav to go. As Colonel Ingersoll says—although he claims, I believe, to be an Agnostic—the great ghost must go. The small ones vanished with the dawn of science, the great ones will disappear with the perfect day. Until then the individuality of man is little more than a dream. EX-REV. J. N. MAXEY.

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., Oct. 6, 1890.

MR. EDITOR: I will say a word to our Catholic friend, Mr. Chas. Boyle, of Texas, whose article appeared recently in THE TRUTH SEEKER, defending the Catholic church. I am sure Freethinkers are no more the enemies of the Catholic church than others who are not Catholic. Freethinkers are necessarily the most impartial, broad-minded, and rational persons living. They are devoted to the truth. As lovers of humanity they cannot be enemies of their fellowmen. Systems and churches are not the people, and the Freethinkers appreciate true individual worth wherever found.

My Texas friend states his individual convictions frankly and clearly, whose sincerity I respect, for I hate hypocrisy. He is correct in his declaration that individual Irish Catholics proved their loyalty to the country of their adoption when the test came. He claims that Irishmen can be loyal to republican ideas and be true to their faith. I think this is impossible, for Dr. McGlynn was a priest in the Catholic church. He was compelled to surrender his liberty as a citizen or be excommunicated. He chose the latter, and is now exercising his civil and political rights against wrong and oppression so cruel, so unmerciful, and so unjust that it appalls the hearts and minds of all who hav a sense of justice.

Freethinkers are not the enemies of any church as long as that church teaches and practices perfect justice to all. The perfect right to worship God or no God cannot be questioned. Religious liberty is the true goal. All that are opposed to this are enemies of truth, justice, and liberty.

I am with Mr. Boyle in some things, where he affirms what I know to be true. I frankly admit I will not advocate for one moment any cause that gains by misrepresenting any doctrin of any church. Let all faiths or no faiths stand or fall on their merits, for certain it is that however the truth may be hidden it will eventually triumph over all that is false and untrue. Mr. Boyle says no priest has power to forgiv sins. He is right; the confessional is misunderstood. Non-Catholics of any intelligence know, or ought to know, that Catholics believe sincerely in a living, personal God and the Virgin Mary, and they certainly pray and worship God and not the priest; and Mr. Boyle is right when he says the Catholic guilty of sin must repent sincerely to God alone or lose their soul, for no priest can save them. This is true, and all ought to view the confessional in its true light. When we come to the question of any future life after death, I honestly differ, though most heartily appreciating his right to be true and loyal to the faith he believes in with all his heart.

The free school system is a great blessing to that unfortunate mass of people who are always at a disadvantage in the unequal race of life. To the poor man education should be as free as the water that runs. I do not know what he refers to in the school-books of history, and to state or publish lies is a wrong to man or child. I know that nothing impure or wrong is taught in public schools. Bad actions and impurity are learned and practiced outside of any school. Schools are not responsible for inherited vicious dispositions, and vastly more harm is done secretly than publicly. I stand for the free school system, because it is a system of justice. I am a positivist, Mr. Boyle a Catholic. I for some time in my life was taught the Catholic faith, but in the course of time I discovered that the church was teaching me one thing and experience another. The practical daily experience of my life did not harmonize with what the church taught. I gradually lost faith in any church. It is a settled fact that it is no use to pray. What good comes to us is of wisdom and circumstances. Now, when we hav to liv and depend entirely on ourselvs, without any help from above, entirely at the mercy of cruel ignorance and the cruelty of fate, then we are not bound to worship an alleged supreme power that does not help us, not even the most pious with all their prayers.

I never in all my life saw, heard, or felt anything but what was human, earthly, and natural. Legends and traditions I pay no attention to. Ordinarily persons are skeptical and rational enough in all other matters and subjects in life, but when it comes to subjects supernatural they are insane, for when a person affirms what he or she cannot prove they are non compos mentis, out of their senses. All knowledge must come through the senses. Facts are knowledge; faith is simply hope. Hope is nothing, for it is based on nothing. Take nothing from nothing and nothing remains to the believer. God gave and God takes and nothing remains, for at death is dissolution. Mr. Boyle's gospel may be the one of happy delusion; mine, the one of despair. However beautiful the idea of heaven, I hav no assurance that there will be rewards and punishments when we die. No man, no church, no power on earth, can prove satisfactorily and positivly to all that there is a God, heaven, hell, or any state of future existence, and as this cannot be proved then it is not a fact. Then what evidence is discovered and what may yet be discovered must be the basis of a strong probability that Atheism is the truth, from which there is no appeal. I know the faith and hope of Christians is powerful and comforting, though the thought of hell they must fear. It is too absurd to discuss the existence of hell. I hav found hell on this material earth. I want to be saved from being the victim of imposition, deception, and treachery that I find in the conditions of life, and not the hell of myth. I find that mean, vicious, selfish, cruel, proud, vain men and women are existing, antagonizing and warring against those who are truly good men and women. I find by experience that I am obliged to be my own savior. Many persons hav lost their lives simply because they were too simple and innocent in their minds. The conditions of life are such that if we are not ever watchful, prudent, and suspecting, we shall be the victims of misfortune and deception. Let those who believe so much in God, his love and protection, giv up self-reliance and ignore the facts that experience and utility reveal, and pray with all their earnestness to God, and see how soon they would be drifting about to destruction on the great ocean of life. I am not willing by words or example to aid the gospel of delusion. I see no hope for the human race for life beyond the grave. I do not want to be humbugged and I will not assist in humbugging others. Let all judge for themselvs and act accordingly.

T. J. CONNERS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Remember, Boys Make Men.

When you see a ragged urchin
Standing wistful in the street,
With torn hat and kneeless trousers,
Dirty face and bare red feet,
Pass not by the child unheeding;
Smile upon him. Mark me, when
He's grown he'll not forget it!
For, remember, boys make men.

When the buoyant, youthful spirits
Overflow in boyish freak,
Chide your child in gentle accents;
Do not in your anger speak.
You must sow in youthful bosoms
Seeds of tender mercies; then
Plants will grow and bear good fruitage,
When the erring boys are men.

Hav you never seen a grandsire,
With his eyes aglow with joy,
Bring to mind some act of kindness—
Something said to him, a boy?
Or relate some slight or coldness,
With a brow all clouded, when
He said they were too thoughtless
To remember boys make men?

Let us try to add some pleasures
To the life of every boy;
For each child needs tender interest
In its sorrow and its joy;
Call your boys home by its brightness;
They'll avoid a gloomy den
And seek for comfort elsewhere—
And remember, boys make men.

Three Good Doctors.

The best of all the pill-box crew,
Since ever time began,
Are the doctors who hav most to do
With the health of a hearty man.

And so I count them up again,
And praise them as I can:
There's Dr. Diet, and Dr. Quiet,
And Dr. Merryman.

There's Dr. Diet, he tries my tongue;
"I know you well," says he.
"Your stomach is poor, and your liver is sprung;
We must make your food agree."

And Dr. Quiet, he feels my wrist,
And he gravely shakes his head.
"Now, now, dear sir, I must insist
That you go at ten to bed."

But Dr. Merryman for me,
Of all the pill-box crew!
For he smiles and says, as he fobs his fee,
"Laugh on, whatever you do."

So now I eat what I ought to eat,
And at ten I go to bed,
And I laugh in the face of cold or heat;
For thus hav the doctors said.

And so I count them up again,
And praise them as I can:
There's Dr. Diet, and Dr. Quiet,
And Dr. Merryman. —D. A.

Anecdotes.

SWEETNESS AND LIGHT.

Dean Swift, in his "Battle of the Books," makes Esop's bees say, "We hav rather chosen to fill our hives with honey and wax, thus furnishing mankind with the two noblest of things, which are sweetness and light."

READY REASON.

Sydney Smith, talking once of the bad effects of late hours, said of some distinguished diner-out, that there would be on his tomb, "He dined late." A wit of the period, Lutterrell, at once added, "And died early."

WHAT'S IN A SYLLABLE?

Longfellow, the poet, was being introduced to Mr. Longworth, when some one remarked on the similarity of the first syllable of the names. "Yes," said the poet, but in this case I fear Pope's lines will apply—'Worth makes the man, the want of it the fellow.'"

ABSENT-MINDEDNESS.

It is said of Dean Ogle, who was a very absent-minded man, that he had been known more than once at a strange table, where there happened not to be a very good dinner, to burst out with, "Dear me, what a very bad dinner! I am so sorry not to hav given you a better," etc., thinking himself at home.

VERY CONSOLING!

There is a story told of a sick man stating his symptoms (which appeared to himself, of course, dreadful) to a medical friend, who at each new item of the disorder exclaimed, "Charming!" "Delightful!" "Pray, go on!" and when he had finished, said, with the utmost pleasure, "Do you know, my dear sir, you hav got a complaint which has been supposed for some time to be extinct?"

THE SHORTEST WAY TO HEAVEN.

Bishop Wilberforce was once standing on a station platform waiting for a train, when a facetious farmer, who had been dining rather too well at a market ordinary, accosted him and said, laughing: "My lord, can you tell us what's the shortest way from here to heaven?" "Oh, yes, my friend," answered the bishop, "turn to the right and keep straight on."

A ROLAND FOR AN OLIVER.

Moore says he once heard Crocker tell the following anecdote: "Fenelon, the great divine, who had often teased Richelieu, the famous statesman (and ineffectually it would seem), for subscriptions to charitable undertakings, was one day telling him that he had just seen his picture. 'And did you ask it for a subscription?' said Richelieu, sneeringly. 'No, I saw there was no chance,' replied Fenelon, 'it was so like you.'"

A Little Girl's Composition.

The caterpillar is a craling thing and hears all over his back and fannie found one down her back and it made me crall like everything, birds eat caterpillars and giv them to their children to eat. I don't see how they can eat them, they are such horrid things, they look so offly, and feel I don't know how. Catterpilars climb trees, the other day I saw a big, big caterpilar, and he was so horrid that I took a stick and kild him with it and threw it away to let the swill man take it home period caterpillars hav 1,000 or more legs, he may not hav so many, and he may hav more the big ones hav more than the little I gess that but i don't know.

Caterpilars eat flies and other insects, such as ants, miscatos and others like that. Also they eat leaves, plum leaves and in short all kinds and some flowers to. Some hav baby catterpilars, in short all of them. Catterpilars drink water, in short everything they can get. Caterpilars, I cannot say much more about caterpilars, but one good rool is never throw a catterpilar at a man or anybody for it givs them such a fright. I hav told you all they eat, drink how many legs it has and the rool. A catterpilar can climb, you can not. Ma be some of you can, I cant, but most of the things that a catterpilar can do we cannot, and most of the things that we can do they cannot.

An Intelligent Dog.

Yesterday a great many people were attracted by the intelligent actions of a little seal-brown dog that was guiding a blind man about the streets. The dog wore a collar to which a chain was attached, and by the pulling of that chain the blind man was able to tell when he approached a place of danger.

At the railroad crossing on Whitehall street the dog suddenly stopped, and his master halted also. In a minute or two a train of cars came rushing along, and as soon as it passed the dog started on his rounds again. When he would come to a steep crossing the dog would warn his master, and the latter would feel his way across.

It was wonderful to watch them. The dog entered every store he came to, and the master followed, picking up a penny here and there from the charitably inclined.

Later in the evening another blind man joined them, and the faithful dog acted as a guide to both of them as they took in the principal streets of the city.—Atlanta Constitution.

Polite.

Little Miss Rose is a person who finds it easy to interpret most things according to her own advantage. One day she sat holding the kitten, and asking her little playmate various questions, to none of which had she thus far obtained an answer.

"Who givs you milk, kitty?" inquired Rose. Kitty struggled a little to get down, but made no reply.

"Do you love me, Kitty?"

No answer.

"Who is the nicest little girl in the world?"

"Mew!" cried kitty, making a desperate effort to escape.

"There, isn't she polite?" asked Rose, triumphantly. "She said 'You!'"

The Toads and the Electric Light.

An American lady tells how she was recently waiting in a carriage near an electric lamp which had just been lighted, while her friend went to a neighboring shop. In the dry road she saw presently a stir, and, looking over the wheels, saw, hopping in all directions across and around, toads aiming for the light. She got out and aimed for the lamp, too. There was a ring of toads underneath it already, waiting for the fall of moths and the insects of night that drop from the life-destroying flame. It was a curious sight—those creatures squatted in a circle, with upturned heads, waiting for the victims to drop into their mouths.

The Magic Lantern.

The stereopticon, or, to be plain, the magic lantern, represents the most delightful manner for the amateur to enjoy the results of his own work. It's very easy to make fairly good slides from negativs by a copying camera or by photographing direct from it, and by a little practice any careful amateur can get them up. A lantern consists of a dark box, with a condensing-lens next to the light; then a frame for the slide and in front an objectiv. A lime light is not at all essential for parlor exhibitions, and the display of twenty or thirty views of one's own preparation is a cheap but decidedly pleasing way to take care of one's friends for an evening. A negativ that would yield a very common-looking photographic print becomes a source of intense pleasure when reproduced as a positiv on glass and thrown on canvas. I think the most pleasing part of amateur photography is the lantern slide feature.

Bats.

Well, they are the most curious creatures that ever you saw in all your lives. Birds, did you say? No, my dears, they are not birds, for birds hav feathers and bats hav fur. Birds hav no teeth and bats do. Birds feed their young ones with worms and flies, but bats nurse their babies with their own milk, hence they must be animals and belong to the order called mammalia.

One rainy day in Boston, I went into a museum, partly in order to get out of the rain, and partly to see what was in there. Among other curiosities there were a couple of bats in a cage, and I looked at them with a great deal of interest. Such queer and odd-looking creatures! I told you bats are animals, and yet they hav wings, or a membrane from the back and breast which answers for wings, stretched on a frame of lengthened finger bones between the four limbs, from the arm to the tail, embracing also the leg; when extended they look like a part of a miniature umbrella. I wanted to see the bat extend his wings and poked him with my lead pencil, whereupon he showed his teeth and made as though he would bite me if he could only get through the wires of his cage. But he stretched his wings afterward, and I saw that the bones of the fingers, I suppose they may be called, were very long, to which the flying membrane, or wing, was attached, and on the quite short thumb was a strong hook, or nail, which was used in climbing or swinging. The foot was different and had five toes with the same strong hook, or nail, by which they suspend the body when they sleep with the head down.

The ears of the bat stand up like cats' ears, and the fur of these odd animals seemed as black as jet, and soft as silk. The eyes are very small, and they cannot see well in daylight, their eyes not being used when the sun shines, hence arose the expression, "As blind as a bat," because in the day-time they tumble about as if they were blind indeed. But at night they can see very nicely, and that is when they seek their food, hence they are called night animals.

They are such very black and hideous-looking creatures that people used to be afraid of them and attributed all sorts of evil deeds to them, such as the sucking of human blood, or fanning their victims with their wings till they died. This is not true as a rule, for bats are harmless, and liv on fruit or insects. The bats I saw in the museum had sliced apple in their food box.

The large vampire bat of South America will, it is said, destroy poultry, and if pressed for food and very hungry, it will attack cattle, and human beings also. In the winter time bats keep very close in their homes, and can liv without eating till warm weather. They are useful to the farmer and gardener in destroying slugs and insects.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—Tell the difference between birds and bats. To what order do they belong? Describe their wings. Tell how they sleep. Describe their eyes. What common expression originated from the bat nature? What is their natural food? What about the vampire bat? How do bats liv in the winter? For what are they useful?

The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S "Children's Corner," MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, has been elected senior member of the School Board of Fall River, Mass.

The Truth Seeker Gives all the News of Freethought, and is Always on Guard Against the Encroachments of Ecclesiastics upon the People's Liberties.

If you have any Ideas or Reforms calculated to benefit humanity write to THE TRUTH SEEKER (sending your subscription) and let the world know of them. THE TRUTH SEEKER publishes each week more letters from the people than any other paper in the world.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is devoted to the defense of Mental Liberty, of American Institutions, and the Preservation of the United States Constitution, so far as regards religious tests, and the maintenance of human rights. It advocates the abolition of all laws based on religion or religious observances. It demands the taxation of church property. It is uncompromisingly opposed to anything tending toward a union of church and state, either in name or in fact.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.
Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

AT THINE OWN HOME.

Send 10 cents to Dr. R. P. Fellows, the noted specialist, for his "Private Counselor"—a valuable book for young and middle-aged men, suffering from a Life-wasting Disease, as the result of youthful follies, indiscretion, and excesses in maturer years. It sets forth an External Application—A POSITIVE CURE, as it matters not how long standing, how hopeless or how many remedies you hav used The book is worth many times its cost, and should be in the hands of those seeking a speedy and permanent cure. Address the doctor at Vineland, N. J., and say where you saw this advertisment.

A GOOD WORD.

Dr. Fellows is an outspoken Liberal, a humanitarian, and a generous patron of the Freethought press. He has many testimonials to the value of his progressive and successful method of treatment, and deserves patronage.—Freethought.

News of the Week.

WILMINGTON, Del., puritans got the street department to declare illegal the display of billboards by theater managers on Sunday on Market street, the main thoroughfare. The next Sunday five wagon-loads were seized. The Academy of Music has engaged counsel and declares it will make a test.

THE Socialist congress at Halle condemned violence and Anarchism.

LEO XIII. has written and published some verses which show that the forte of Christ's vicar is not poetry.

REV. A. B. CRUCHET, Presbyterian, is in trouble at Montreal for seducing a girl and abandoning her and her child.

IN Jersey City, N. J., the Christian boys who make a practice of stoning Jews killed one with a stone on the 14th.

BROWN county, S. D., has appealed to Chicago for aid, the crops there having failed for three years, and starvation being nigh.

THE chief of police at New Orleans was assassinated on the 15th by the Mafia, an Italian secret murder society which he had tried to crush.

JOHN VOTICIL is being tried at New York city for throwing his six-year-old son out of the window. When arrested he announced, "I am Christ."

THE Socialist red flag was allowed to float beside the American over the building in which Socialists held a mass meeting at New York the other night. It is now allowed in Germany by the emperor, a thing Bismarck would never permit.

CANON FARRAR and the publishers of the "Life of Christ" are disputing over the fairness of the compensation given the author, each accusing the other of dishonesty.

PARTS of Nicaraugua are suffering from earthquakes, and the volcano Mombacho is in eruption. Processions of women convey saints' images about, praying and singing, imploring God for mercy.

CATHOLICS continue to vent their spleen at republicanism in Brazil, and everywhere else where it has overturned one-man sovereignty favorable to them. One Catholic organ says, "The abortions called republics in France and Brazil are simply financial schemes to enrich a band of confidence men."

CATHOLICS complain against France's large appropriations for education. Of the fact that the expenditure in 1876, before Radical rule, was 39,000,000 francs, while it is now 173,000,000, they exclaim, "134,000,000 added without visible need! Truly, Atheistic education is a costly luxury!"

WILLIAM FILLINGER and wife, of Perry, Mich., having become half-crazed by revival meetings, were so worried that the man's mother, who lived with them, had not had baptism, that on the 18th they took water to her room and performed the ceremony by dashing it in her face till she ceased to struggle. Neighbors discovered the corpse and arrested the pious pair.

POLICE recount of New York city's population, 1,710,715; previous count, 1,513 501; difference, 197 214. Acting Superintendent Childs of the census bureau at Washington informs Mayor Grant that he will not order a recount by the board, having full confidence in the previous one. The mayor is angry, and will appeal to higher authorities, if necessary to the president or Congress.

THE government of Rome announced that the weekly market day which fell on Wednesday, September 24th, would be transferred to Thursday, because the Jewish feast Kipur would absent the Hebrew dealers on Wednesday. The Catholics, who hav been unable to get the government to recognize their feasts lately, are angry at what they call "the domineering intentions of the sons of Israel."

THE French republic is displeased at the attentions shown the comte de Paris by Americans during his visit here. Because he is a friend of Catholics, however, those sectarians defend him, one New York Catholic organ saying that the French government hates him "for no other cause than that he possesses a clear title to a country that is now painfully mismanaged by a club of radical politicians who call themselvs a republic."

DAVID SENDETH AFTER BATHSHEBA.

And David sent messengers and took her.—2 Sam. xi, 4.

WHEN Science is thus commanded to surrender her intellectual convictions, may she not ask the ecclesiastic to remember the past? The contest respecting the figure of the earth, and the location of heaven and hell, ended adversely to him. He affirmed that the earth is an extended plane, and that the sky is a firmament, the floor of heaven, through which again and again persons hav been seen to ascend. The globular form demonstrated beyond any possibility of contradiction by astronomical facts, and by the voyage of Magellan's ship, he then maintained that it is the central body of the universe, all others being in subordination to it, and it the grand object of God's regard. Forced from this position, he next affirmed that it is motionless, the sun and the stars actually revolving, as they apparently do, around it. The invention of the tele-cope proved that here again he was in error. Then he maintained that all the motions of the solar system are regulated by providential intervention; the "Principia" of Newton demonstrated that they are due to irresistible law. He then affirmed that the earth and all the celestial bodies were created about six thousand years ago, and that in six days the order of nature was settled, and plants and animals in their various tribes introduced. Constrained by the accumulating mass of adverse evidence, he enlarged his days into periods of indefinit length—only, however, to find that even this device was inadequate. The six ages, with their six special creations, could no longer be maintained, when it was discovered that species slowly emerged in one age, reached a culmination in a second, and gradually died out in a third; this overlapping from age to age would not only hav demanded creations, but re-creations also. He affirmed that there had been a deluge, which covered the whole earth above the tops of the highest mountains, and that the waters of this flood were removed by a wind. Correct ideas respecting the dimensions of the atmosphere, and of the sea, and of the operation of evaporation, proved how untenable these statements are. Of the progenitors of the human race, he declared that they had come from their maker's hand perfect, both in body and mind, and had subsequently experienced a fall. He is now considering how best to dispose of the evidence continually accumulating respecting the savage condition of prehistoric man. Is it at all surprising that the number of those who hold the opinions of the church in light esteem should so rapidly increase?—Draper.
